To an indictment against a parish for not repairing a road beginning at the confines of the parish of L. and ending at B., containing in length 2390 yards, the parish pleaded as to part commencing at the confines of the parish of L., and continuing thence onwards in length 363 yards or thereabouts, that the same adjoined on the north-east side thereof to certain lands in the occupation of V. as tenant to P., and on the south-west side to certain other lands in the occupation of J. as tenant to the said P., and that the said P., by reason of the tenure of such lands ought to repair such part of the said highway adjoining to the said lands being in length as aforesaid or thereabouts, when and as often as there should be occasion, &c.; and as to another part commencing at the termination of the said part of the said highway last described, and continuing thence onwards in length 499 yards or thereabouts, that the same on each side thereof adjoined to certain other lands in the occupation of B. as tenant to C., and that C. by reason of his tenure of such lands ought to repair such part of the said highway adjoining to the last-mentioned lands. (k) The replication was that P. C., &c., by reason of their several and respective tenures of the said several lands ought not respectively to repair such part of the said highway respectively as adjoins to the lands in the several and respective tenures of the said P. C., &c., modo et formâ. It appeared that on entering the road from the parish of L. the land of P. extended on both sides of the road, but about eighteen yards further on the left than on the right-hand side. Where P.'s land ended C.'s land began on each side of the road, so that for the eighteen yards P.'s land and C.'s were opposite to each other. It was objected that there was a misdescription, for it was stated that P. was bound to repair the whole road and C. the whole road, but the evidence was that there were about eighteen yards in which P. and C. would be bound to repair ad medium filum viæ. It was answered, that the form of the issue, as well as the substance, was, whether persons holding lands were bound to repair the road adjoining to their lands—that the statement of so many yards 'or thereabouts,' left it quite at large, as much as if it had been alleged under a videlicet; but it was held that the plea was not proved; for it was an entire plea which the defendants were bound wholly to prove, and as no part of the plea stated that P. & C. were bound to repair up to the middle of the road there was a variance. (l)

(i) Rex v. Bridekirk, 11 East, 304.

(k) The plea proceeded to aver the liability of the owners of the adjoining lands to repair the residue of the road in a similar manner.

(l) Rex v. Rockfield, Monm. Summer Ass. 1830. Bosanquet, J. There were similar variances in the proof as to other parts of the road. MSS. C. S. G.

Where a plea to an indictment in the ordinary form against a parish for nonrepair of a road, alleged that the road lay within a township, and that the inhabitants of the township had been accustomed from time immemorial to repair all highways within the township, which otherwise would be repairable by the parish at large, and that the inhabitants of the parish at large had not been accustomed to repair the highways within the township, and that by reason of the premises the township ought to repair the said road, and the replication traversed the custom for the township to repair all highways within it as stated in the plea, and a verdict was found for the defendants; judgment was arrested, because the plea did not aver that the highway was one which, but for the custom, would be repairable by the parish at large, and so did not show what party other than the defendants was liable to repair it. (m) obligation to

If a person indicted for not repairing ratione tenuræ, or a township, or other particular persons, indicted for not repairing by prescription, plead (though unnecessarily) to the indictment, and show who ought to repair, as they must do, it is necessary to traverse their obligation to repair: but if a parish be indicted for not repairing a highway, or a county for not repairing a bridge, and they throw the charge upon another, they ought not to traverse their obligation to repair, for it is a traverse of matter of law; and such traverse, though very often inserted, is demurrable, and therefore ought always to be omitted. (n) Where an indictment charged that the defendant ought to repair ratione tenuræ of certain lands inclosed and encroached by him out of the highway, a plea, traversing the obligation ratione tenuræ, was held good; on the ground that it professed to charge the defendant ratione tenuræ, and not by reason of the encroachment; and that the obligation ratione tenuræ would continue, though the land should be again thrown open to the highway, whereas the obligation by reason of the encroachment would not. (o)

Where an indictment for the nonrepair of a highway in Wingfield alleged that the defendant was liable by reason of the tenure of certain lands in Wingfield, and it appeared that the defendant occupied a farm, and that the occupiers of that farm had for a long series of years repaired the road; but the farm was made up of lands lying in Wingfield and three other parishes, in two of which there was a part of the same road, also repaired by the occupier of the farm; Rolfe, B., left it to the jury to say whether the liability, if proved, was in respect of the part of the farm in Wingfield to repair the road in Wingfield; and told them they must be satisfied that the liability was in respect of that part only in order to convict on this indictment. If the liability was a liability to repair the road passing through the three parishes

(2 East, 356, in notis.) and that the better precedents have always inserted it. Supposing such traverse to be necessary, it is sufficiently expressed by a plea concluding thus, 'And that the inhabitants of the said parish at large ought not to be charged with the repairing and amending the same.'

(o) Rex v. Stoughton, 2 Saund. 160.

by reason of the joint occupation of the whole farm, the defendant must be acquitted. (p)

In one case it was held that evidence of reputation could not be admitted to establish a liability to repair ratione tenuræ, that liability being a matter of a private nature. (q) But it has since been held that evidence of reputation is admissible in such a case (r)

Reputation.

Where the inhabitants of a parish pleaded that the inhabitants of a particular district were bound by prescription to repair all common highways situate within that district, save and except one common highway within the said district, it was holden that the plea might be supported, although it appeared that the excepted highway was of recent date; and it was also holden that in such a plea it was not necessary to state by whom the excepted highway was repairable. (s) And such a plea will be good although it does not state any consideration for the liability of the inhabitants of the district. (t)

Where any subdivision of a parish is liable to the repair of a highway, and the indictment is, notwithstanding, preferred against the whole parish, care should be taken to plead the liability of such subdivision; for if judgment be given against the parish, whether after verdict upon not guilty, or by default, the judgment will be conclusive evidence of the liability of the whole parish to repair, unless fraud can be shown. (u) Fraud, however, is only put for example; for if the other districts can show that they had no notice of the indictment, and that the defence was made and conducted entirely by the district in which the highway indicted lay, without their knowledge or privity, the Court will consider it as being substantially an indictment against that district, and give the other districts leave to plead the prescription to a subsequent indictment for not repairing the highways in that parish. (v)

Where a parish is indicted, and a subdivision of such parish is liable to the repair, the parish must take care to plead such liability.

Evidence of former conviction conclusive unless fraud, &c., be shown.

Where to an indictment for not repairing a highway against the parish of Eardisland, consisting of three townships, Eardisland, Burton, and Hardwicke, there was a plea on the part of Burton that each of the three townships had immemorially repaired its own highways separately; it was held that the records of indictments against the parish generally for not repairing highways situate in the township of Eardisland, and the township of Hardwicke, with general pleas of not guilty, and convictions thereupon, were prima facie evidence to disprove the custom for each township to repair separately; but that evidence was admissible to show that these pleas of not guilty were pleaded only by the inhabitants of the townships of Eardisland and Hardwicke, without the privity of Burton. Previous conviction conclusive evidence of liability to repair ratione tenuræ.

The defendant was indicted for the nonrepair of a highway, which it was alleged he was liable to repair ratione tenuræ of certain lands called Saw-pit Field, and pleaded not guilty. To prove this liability evidence was given of the conviction of W. Smith, a former owner and occupier of the same lands, for the nonrepair of the same highway, showing that in the year 1801 a presentment had been preferred against him, alleging his liability to repair it ratione tenuræ of the lands called Saw-pit Field, to which he pleaded guilty. Evidence was also given of the repair of the said highway subsequently to the said conviction of W. Smith by the occupiers of the lands, of which Saw-pit Field formed part; that public notice was given when Saw-pit Field was offered for sale of the liability to repair the highway in question, and that the defendant, who purchased the lands after such notice, was now the owner and occupier of Saw-pit Field; and, upon a case reserved after a verdict of guilty, the judges were unanimously of opinion that there was evidence to go to the jury of immemorial usage, and of the defendant's liability to repair the highway ratione tenuræ; and Parke, B., Alderson, B., Patteson, J., and Coleridge, J., were of opinion that the conviction of W. Smith estopped the defendant, who was privy to him in estate, from denying his liability ratione tenuræ. If the defendant had pleaded that he was not liable ratione tenuræ, then the prosecutor might have replied the previous conviction as an estoppel, but as he had pleaded the general issue, there was no opportunity of pleading the conviction as an estoppel, and therefore the prosecutor might take advantage of it upon the evidence as conclusive. (x) And on an indictment for nonrepair of a highway against a township alleging it to be liable by prescription to repair such highways in the township as the parish but for the prescription would have been liable to repair, with a plea of not guilty, a record of a presentment by a justice, under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, on his own view, that the road in question was out of repair, and alleging that it was in the township, and that the township ought to repair it, with a plea of guilty by two of the inhabitants, and a sentence of a fine, was held conclusive evidence against the township that the highway was situate within it and that the township was liable to repair it; and that, though the presentment might be bad on demurrer, in arrest of judgment or on error, the conviction being before a competent tribunal, and unreversed, was not the less an estoppel. It was also held that it was unnecessary to prove that the fine had been paid, as no fraud or collusion was shown. (y) So where a road ran over a waste in the township of Ecclesall, but had always been repaired by Hallam, both before and after an inclosure Act for Ecclesall, and three years before the inclosure Act Hallam had submitted to an indictment for nonrepair of the road; it was held that that conviction was conclusive evidence that the road lay in Hallam, and that an award under the Act was void as to that road, as the commissioners had only jurisdiction over roads in Ecclesall. (z)

(x) Reg. v. Blakemore, 2 Den. C. C. 410.

(y) Reg. v. Haughton, 1 E. & B. 501. It was also held that a recital in an Act that the highway was in another township was only evidence, and did not prevail over the estoppel.

(z) Reg. v. Nether Hallam, 6 Cox

Upon an indictment against the inhabitants of the township of B., it appeared that the road indicted passed through three adjoining townships, B., Attercliffe, and T.; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the record of an indictment against the township of Attercliffe for nonrepair of part of the highway in that township, to which that township appeared to have submitted, was admissible for the purpose of proving that the way in question was a highway. It was clear that user by the public and repair by the township would be admissible as facts raising a presumption of highway; and an indictment was another fact of the same class: and proceedings at law to compel the repair of a highway (when submitted to) show the right as much or more than acts of repair without compulsion would have done. (a)

It has been held that the record of an acquittal upon an indictment for not repairing a highway is not evidence to show that the parish is not liable: on the ground that some other parties might have indicted them, and that those parties could not be bound by this record. (b) And a satisfactory reason for rejecting such evidence altogether seems to be that the acquittal might have proceeded upon the want of proof that the road was out of repair. (c) In the case of an indictment for not repairing a highway, which it was alleged the defendant was bound to repair ratione tenuræ, it was held that an award made under a submission by a former tenant for years of the premises, could neither be received as an adjudication, the tenant having no authority to bind the rights of his landlord, nor as evidence of reputation, being post litem motam. (d)

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 100, enacts, that 'no person shall be deemed incompetent to give evidence or be disqualified from giving testimony or evidence in any action, suit, prosecution, or other legal proceedings to be brought or had in any Court of law or equity, or before any justice or justices of the peace, under or by virtue of this Act, by reason of being an inhabitant of the parish in which any offence shall be committed, or of being a treasurer, clerk, surveyor, district surveyor, assistant surveyor, collector, or other officer appointed by virtue of this Act, nor shall such testimony or evidence for any of the reasons aforesaid be rejected or liable to be questioned or set aside.' The inhabitants of a parish indicted for not repairing a highway were not competent to give evidence for the defendants, (e) under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, and it has been held that they were not rendered competent by the 54 Geo. 3, c. 124, s. 9. (f)

A conviction of an adjoining township for nonrepair of a continuation of the road indicted is admissible.

Record of an acquittal is not evidence to show that the parish is not liable to repair.

The prosecutor may be a witness for the prosecution.

Certiorari.

On an indictment for not repairing a highway, the prosecutor was examined as a witness for the prosecution, and no objection was taken to his competency; (h) and it seems that the prosecutor was a competent witness, under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, for, though the Court was authorized to award costs against him in case the proceeding was vexatious, (i) yet the Court would scarcely presume that the prosecutor's conduct had been vexatious, so as to raise an objection to his competency, especially after the finding of a bill by the grand jury. (k) The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, does not give any costs against the prosecutor, so that he seems now clearly to be a competent witness.

Though the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 24, declared that no presentments or indictments should be removed by certiorari before traverse and judgment, except where the obligation of repairing came in question, yet this clause did not take away the writ at the instance of the prosecutor, for the crown does not traverse; and it was calculated merely to prevent delay on the part of defendants. (l) And it was held to be no objection to a certiorari to remove such a presentment, that it was prosecuted by another than the justice presenting, if it were by his consent. (m) The 5 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 6, also provided, that if any indictment or presentment be against any persons for not repairing highways or bridges, and the right or title to repair the same may come in question, upon a suggestion and affidavit made of the truth thereof, a certiorari may be granted, provided that the party prosecuting such certiorari enter into the recognizance mentioned in the Act. Upon an indictment against a parish for not repairing a highway, the right to repair may come in question so as to entitle the parish to remove it by certiorari, though the parish plead not guilty only, it being stated in an affidavit filed by the defendants, that, on the trial of the indictment, the question, whether the parish were liable to repair, and the right to repair, would come in issue. (n) And the prosecutor may remove an indictment by certiorari, though there be no recognizance given according to the statute. (o)

A new trial may be allowed after an acquittal.

The general rule of a new trial never being allowed where the defendant is acquitted in a criminal case, formerly prevailed in a prosecution for not repairing a highway, though such prosecution is usually carried on for the purpose of trying or enforcing a civil liability. (p) But if the justice of the case seemed to require it, the Court used to stay the judgment upon payment of costs, until under the 54 Geo. 3, c. 124, s. 9, for the parish officers in an ejectment brought by them, and said 'we cannot agree with Oxenden v. Palmer, and the decisions to which it has given birth.' another indictment was preferred for the purpose of trying the question of liability to repair. (q) But it is now held that where the proceeding is in substance merely to try a civil right a new trial may be granted after an acquittal. (r) and therefore a new trial would be granted in a case where the question was as to the liability to repair or the nonrepair of a highway; but not where the charge was a wrongful obstruction of a highway. (s)

The object of prosecutions for nuisances to highways is to effect either a removal of the nuisance in cases of obstruction, or the repair of the highway in cases where the nuisance charged is the want of reparation. The judgment of the Court is usually a fine, and an order on the defendant, at his own costs, to abate the nuisance in the one case, (t) and in the other a fine, for the purpose of obliging the defendants to repair the nuisance; for they will not be discharged by submitting to a fine, as a distringas will go ad infinitum until they repair. (u) But writs of distringas are the only further remedy on an indictment, upon which the Court has already pronounced judgment by imposing a fine. For the fine is the punishment for the neglect and offence of which the defendants are indicted; and, though the Court may compel an actual repair, yet the punishment has been inflicted, and they cannot inflict a further punishment or fine. The parish may, however, be again indicted; and a fine may be imposed on such new indictment. (v) And upon this principle an order of a Court of quarter sessions by which it was ordered that the fine theretofore imposed for the not repairing a bridge should be increased by a certain sum, was quashed. (w) In order to warrant a judgment for abating the nuisance, it must be stated in the indictment to be continuing; as otherwise such a judgment would be absurd. (x) And if the Court be satisfied that the nuisance is effectually abated before judgment is prayed upon the indictment, they will not in their discretion give judgment to abate it. And though it was contended, on the authority of several cases, (y) that if the nuisance be of a permanent nature the regular judgment must be to abate it, the Court refused to give such judgment upon an indictment for an obstruction in a public highway, where the highway, after the conviction of the defendant, was regularly turned by an order of magistrates, and a certificate was obtained of the new way being fit for the passage of the public and the affidavits stated that so much of the old way indicted as was still

It may be observed also that, in cases of indictments for misdemeanors, the Court will, in its discretion, save the point for consideration, giving the defendant an opportunity, in case he shall be convicted to move to have an acquittal entered. *Rex v. retained was freed from all obstruction. (z) But where the existence of a building, &c., is a nuisance, and the indictment imports that it was existing at the time of the bill being found, it seems that if a judgment be pronounced, it can only be a judgment to abate the nuisance. (a) But where the nuisance arises not from the existence of the thing, but from the use to which it is applied, a judgment to abate, &c., is not necessary; (b) and, therefore, if a stinking trade is indicted, it does not follow that the house in which it is carried on is to be pulled down. (c) And if a house is a nuisance from being too high, so much only as is too high shall be pulled down. (d)

Fines, penalties, and forfeitures, how to be levied and applied.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 96, enacts, that 'no fine, issue, penalty, or forfeiture for not repairing the highway, or not appearing to any indictment for not repairing the same, shall hereafter be returned into the Court of Exchequer or other Court, but shall be levied by and paid into the hands of such person residing in or near the parish where the road shall lie, as the justices or Court imposing such fines, issues, penalties, or forfeitures, shall order and direct, to be applied towards the repair and amendment of such highway; and the person so ordered to receive such fine shall and is hereby required to receive, apply, and account for the same according to the direction of such justices or Court, or in default thereof shall forfeit double the sum received; and if any fine, issue, penalty, or forfeiture to be imposed for not repairing the highway, or not appearing as aforesaid, shall hereafter be levied on any inhabitant of such parish, township, or place, then such inhabitant shall and may make his complaint to the justices at a special sessions for the highways; and the said justices are hereby empowered and authorized, by warrant under their hands, to make an order on the surveyor of the parish for payment of the same out of the money receivable by him for the highway rate, and shall, within two months next after service of the said order on him, pay unto such inhabitant the money therein mentioned.'

Application for a rate to reimburse must be made in a reasonable time after the levy.

Upon the latter part of sec. 47 of the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, which was similar to the preceding provision of the new Act, it was held that the application for the rate to reimburse the inhabitants, on whom a fine has been levied, after a conviction upon an indictment against the parish for nonrepair, ought to be made within a reasonable time after such levy, and before any material change of inhabitants; and the Court of King's Bench refused a mandamus to the justices to make such rate after an interval of eight years; though applications had been made in the interval, from time to time, to the magistrates below, who had declined to make the rate

(z) Rex v. Inledon, 13 East, 164. Judgment was given that the defendant should pay a fine to the King of 6s. 8d. In Rex v. Mawbey, 6 T. R. 619, it was held that a certificate by justices of the peace, that a highway indicted is in repair is a legal instrument recognized by the Courts of law, and admissible in evidence after conviction when the Court are about to impose a fine. In Rex v. Wingfield, 1 Blac. Rep. 602, where a person was convicted upon an indictment for not repairing a road ratione tenuræ, it was held that the Court would not inflict a small fine, on a certificate of the road being repaired, until the prosecutor's costs were paid.

on the ground that the parish at large had been improperly indicted and convicted, and though, so lately as the year before the application to the Court of King's Bench, the magistrates had ordered an account to be taken of the quantum expended upon the repairs out of the money levied. (e) In a case where, although separate parts of a parish were bound to maintain their own roads, there had been an indictment and judgment against the parish generally, but such indictment was only known to and defended by that part of the parish in which the defective road lay, it was held that the justices might make a warrant to reimburse upon that part only; and the Court of King's Bench granted a mandamus to collect to the surveyor of that part only. (f)

The 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 10, provides for a portion of the fine being paid by the turnpike trustees when the highway shall be a turnpike road; and enacts, that when the inhabitants of any parish, township, or place, shall be indicted or presented for not repairing any highway, being turnpike road, and the Court, before whom such indictment or presentment shall be preferred, shall impose a fine for the repair of such road, such fine shall be apportioned, together with the costs and charges, between such inhabitants and the turnpike trustees as to the Court shall seem just: and the Court may order the treasurer of such turnpike road to pay the same out of the money then in his hands, or next to be received by him, in case it shall appear to such Court, from the circumstances of such turnpike debts and revenues, that the same may be paid without endangering the security of the creditors who have advanced their money upon the credit of the tolls. The true construction of a similar provision in the repealed Act of 13 Geo. 3, was held to be, that the Court which imposed the fine had the power to apportion it between the parish and the trust; so that where an indictment was originally preferred at the assizes and afterwards removed into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari, it was held that the Court of King's Bench might apportion the fine. (g)

If a turnpike road be out of repair the inhabitants of the parish are liable to be indicted, although the tolls are appropriated by the Act to the repair of the road, and the inhabitants in such case must seek relief under the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 10. (h)

Where an indictment was preferred at the assizes under an order of two justices, pursuant to sec. 95 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, and the defendants were found guilty upon the trial of the traverse at a subsequent assizes, it was held that the judge had no discretion, but was bound to award costs to the prosecutor. (i) But where an indictment was preferred under a similar order, and tried at nisi prius, after having been removed by certiorari, and the defendants acquitted on the ground that the road was not a highway, it was objected that the prosecutor was not entitled to costs under sec. 95 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50; 1st, because that section only applied to cases where the publicity of the road was admitted, but the liability to repair disputed; 2ndly, that the section did not apply to cases where the indictment was removed by certiorari; 3rdly, that sec. 95 was to be construed together with sec. 98, and merely meant that where the defence was frivolous the costs were to be paid out of the fund there mentioned; and it was held that the prosecutor was not entitled to costs. (h) And it is now settled that there is no jurisdiction to make an order for costs unless the jury find or it appear affirmatively that the road is a highway. (l) Where a jury is discharged without giving a verdict there is no power to order the costs to be paid out of the highway rate. (m) So the judge has no jurisdiction to certify for costs under sec. 95, where the road described in the indictment is not the road ordered to be indicted; e. g., where it is in another parish. (n) It was held in several cases that the Court had no jurisdiction to award costs where the defendants pleaded guilty. (o) But it has since been deliberately held that the Court may order the costs where the defendants plead guilty. (p)

An order directing an indictment for the nonrepair of a road is void unless it show on the face of it that it was made at a special sessions for the highways within the division in which the road lies, and therefore such an order will not support an order for payment of the costs. (q) An order for costs must state out of what funds the costs are to be paid or it is bad. (r) The costs may be ordered to be paid to the prosecutor where he has removed the indictment into the Court of Queen's Bench, as well as where it is removed by the defendants. (s) An order to indict a road is not invalid simply because one of the justices who made it is interested, as where he is the owner of the land liable to the repair of the road. (t) Where an indictment is found at one quarter sessions and the trial adjourned to the next sessions, the latter may make an order for costs. (u) Where an indictment was

His Lordship intimated that he thought the last point untenable; it was also objected that as the order to indict the road did not follow the information, on which it was founded, in the description of the road, it was altogether a nullity, but the learned judge said he was inclined to think that when the justices had the case before them they might make any order respecting it which they thought fit. Sed quare, for the information on oath is the foundation of the magistrates' jurisdiction, and if they make an order, as they did in Reg. v. Chedworth, including a greater length of road than the information comprehends, pro tanto they are acting without any information at all. See Rex v. Sopar, 3 B. & C. 857. C. S. G. The practice in these cases on the Oxford Circuit has been to put in and prove the information and order of the justices in the beginning of the case. The indictments have all been preferred against a parish under an order, and they pleaded that an individual was liable to repair the road ratione tenuræ, and the jury found a verdict for the defendants, Wightman, J., held that the prosecutor was entitled to his costs, and granted a mandamus to compel the sessions to order payment of them. (v)

Where an order for costs is made in a Criminal Court the Court or its officer ought to ascertain the amount. Where therefore a judge ordered the costs to be paid generally, but they were not ascertained or taxed during the continuance of the commission; it was held that a mandamus to enforce their payment could not be granted. (w) But where an indictment was removed by certiorari, and the judge at nisi prius ordered the costs to be paid out of 'the rate made and levied' in the parish according to the statute, it was held that this order was good, though it did not name the amount of the costs, and that a side bar rule might be obtained for the Coroner and Attorney of the Court of Queen's Bench to tax the costs. (x) And if the costs are not paid by the defendants in pursuance of such rule an attachment for contempt will be awarded against them. (y) The words 'rate made and levied' in sec. 95 do not point merely to any particular rate already made and levied at the time when an order of costs is made, but to the highway rate in general, and it is the duty of the surveyors in office at the time an order is made to pay the costs out of any funds then in their hands, or, if they have none, to make and levy a rate for the purpose; and the order binds not only the surveyors in office at the time it was made but their successors also until the costs are paid, and if they are not paid a mandamus will be granted to take proper steps towards their payment. (z)

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 98, enacts, 'that it shall and may be lawful for the Court before whom any indictment shall be preferred for not repairing highways, to award costs to the prosecutor, to be paid by the person so indicted, if it shall appear to the said Court that the defence made to such indictment was frivolous or vexatious.' (a) It was held under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 64, which was similar to the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 98, that it was matter to be determined by inquiry, whether a person was or was not the prosecutor within that section; and that a court of quarter sessions, before whom a parish was acquitted upon the trial of an indictment for not repairing a highway, might, by their order, award C. and E. to pay costs to the parish, although the names of C. and E. were not on the back of the indictment, and although the indictment originated in a presentment of A. and B., constables, whose names were on the indictment; and it was also held to be enough, if the order was entitled as in the prosecution of C. and E. without showing further that C. and E. were prosecutors; and that it need not appear on the face of the order that the indictment was tried, if that appear by the record of the proceedings; and also that the order was good in form, if it was for the payment of the costs to the solicitor of the parish. (b) The repealed statute did not direct a certificate to be given in a precise form of words, in order to entitle the party to costs; therefore where the judge, on the trial of an indictment, certified that the defence was frivolous, without also awarding costs in express terms, it was held that the prosecutor was entitled to costs. (c)

Where at the trial the judge certified under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 64, that the defence was frivolous, the prosecutor was entitled to costs, although the defendant obtained a rule to arrest the judgment. (d) The 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 64, only applied to cases tried in the ordinary course; where, therefore, an indictment was removed by certiorari, and a new trial ordered, and the prosecutor's costs of both trials were to abide the event of the new trial, it was held that this special rule took away the judge's power to certify in favour of the defendant. (e)

Upon an indictment which had been removed into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari and been sent down for trial to the assizes, where the defendants were acquitted for want of prosecution, it was held that the Court of King's Bench had no power under the repealed statute to award costs to the defendants on the ground of the prosecution having been vexatious, but that the application ought to have been made to the judge at nisi prius. (f)

It was once held that the judge on the trial of an indictment, preferred by order of two justices under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 95, and removed by certiorari and tried at the assizes, had no authority to award costs, because the defence was frivolous, under sec. 98, as that power was limited to the Court at which the indictment was preferred; (g) but in that case the Court of Queen's Bench awarded the costs to the prosecutor, for 'the Court before whom any indictment shall be preferred' included the Queen's Bench. (h)

It has since, however, been expressly held, that where an indictment for nonrepair of a highway is removed by certiorari, the judge at the trial may certify that the defence is frivolous, and award the costs. (i) And where an indictment has been preferred under the order of justices, and removed by certiorari and the defendants are convicted, the judge who tries the case must order the costs. (k)

The 5 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 3, enacts, that if the defendant, prosecuting such writ of certiorari as is mentioned in that Act, 'be convicted of the offence for which he was indicted, that then the Court of King's Bench shall give reasonable costs to the prosecutor if he be the party grieved or injured, or be a justice of the peace, mayor, bailiff, constable, &c., or any other civil officer, who shall prosecute upon the account of any fact committed or done that concerned him or them as officer or officers to prosecute or present to be taxed, &c. Upon this statute it has been held, that a justice of the peace who indicts a road for being out of repair is entitled to his costs, after a removal of the indictment by certiorari, if the defendant be convicted. (l) But the prosecutor must show himself to be the party grieved in order to obtain costs under this statute: therefore, in a case where he did not apply for the costs until two years after judgment given, and it did not appear that he had ever used the highway before it was stopped, and it was stated, that while the highway was stopped, he had declared that he did not care about it, the Court held that he was not entitled to costs as the party grieved, although the prosecution was at his instance and expense. (m) In a case where this statute was considered as a remedial law, (n) it was held that several persons were entitled to costs under it as prosecutors of an indictment, removed by certiorari, for not repairing a highway: one, as constable of the manor within which the highway lay; the others, as parties grieved; they having used the way for many years in passing and repassing from their homes to the next market town, and being obliged, by reason of the want of repair, to take a more circuitous route (o)

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 111, enacts, 'that if the inhabitants of any parish shall agree at a vestry to defend any indictment found against any such parish, or to appeal against any order made by or proceeding of any justice of the peace in the execution of any powers given by this Act, or to defend any appeal, it shall and may be lawful for the surveyor of such parish to charge in his account the reasonable expenses incurred in defending such prosecution, or prosecuting or defending such appeal, after the same shall have been agreed to by such inhabitants at a vestry or public meeting as aforesaid, and allowed by two justices of the peace within the division where such highway shall be; which expenses, when so agreed to or allowed, shall be paid by such parish out of the fines, forfeitures, payments, and rates authorized to be collected and raised by virtue of this Act: provided, nevertheless, that if the money so collected and raised is not sufficient to defray the expenses of repairing the highways in the said parish, as well as of defending such prosecution, or prosecuting or defending such appeal as aforesaid, the said surveyor is hereby authorized to make, collect, and levy an additional rate in the same manner as the rate by this Act is authorized to be made for the repair of the highway.'

SEC. III.

Of Nuisances to Public Rivers.

IN books of the best authority, a river common to all men is called a highway: (a) and if it be considered as a highway, any obstructions, by which its course and the use of it as a highway by the King's subjects are impeded, will fall within the same principles as those which relate to public roads, and which have been considered in the preceding section of this chapter. But it should be observed that a learned judge appears to have considered a river as differing, in some respects, at least, from a highway, where he is reported to have said, 'Callis compares a navigable river to a highway: but no two cases can be more distinct. In the latter case, if the way be foundrous and out of repair, the public have a right to go on the adjoining land: but if a river should happen to be choked up with mud, that would not give the public a right to cut another passage through the adjoining lands.' (b) In the same case the Court decided, that the public are not entitled at common law to tow on the banks of ancient navigable rivers. (c)

Rivers considered as highways.

The term, navigable, as applied to a river, is a relative and comprehensive term, containing within it all such rights upon the waterway as, with relation to the circumstances of each river, are necessary for the full and convenient passage of vessels and boats along it. Therefore, where a river was a tidal river, and so shallow at certain states of the tide that a vessel could not float, but necessarily grounded, it was held that the jury were rightly directed that a navigable river was so at all times, and that a person might go upwards or downwards, though he might not be able to reach the port or the deep water in one tide or without grounding, and that even if such grounding subjected him to compensate for injury done, that did not affect the nature of the right in respect to the time of enjoyment. (d)

It has been before observed, that a highway may be changed by the act of God; and upon the same principle it has been holden, that if a water, which has been an ancient highway, by degrees change its course, and go over different ground from that whereon it used to run, yet the highway continues in the new channel, in the same manner as in the old. (e) It has been held that the soil of a navigable river prima facie, though not necessarily, belongs to the King; and is not by presumption of law in the owners of the adjoining lands. (f)

Where the course of a river is changed it is still a highway.

(f) Rex v. Smith, Dougl. 441; but this seems not free from doubt. See Williams v. Wilcox, post, p. 537. Reg. v. Wharton,

How public right to navigate a river may be destroyed.

The public right of navigation in a river or creek may be extinguished either by Act of Parliament or writ of ad quod damnum and inquisition thereon, or under certain circumstances by commissioners of sewers, or by natural causes, such as the recess of the sea, or the accumulation of mud or sand. Where, therefore, a public road, obstructing a channel once navigable, has existed for so long a time that the state of the channel, at the time when the road was made, cannot be proved, in favour of the existing state of things it must be presumed that the right of navigation was extinguished in one of the modes before mentioned, and the road cannot be removed as a nuisance to the navigation. (g) Every creek or river, into which the tide flows, is not on that account necessarily a public navigable channel, although sufficiently large for that purpose, but the flowing of the tide into such a creek or river is strong primâ facie evidence that it is a public navigation. (h)

Obstructions in public rivers.

It is a common nuisance to divert part of a public navigable river, whereby the current of it is weakened and made unable to carry vessels of the same burthen as it could before. (i) And the laying timber in a public river is as much a nuisance, where the soil belongs to the party, as if it were not his, if thereby the passage of vessels is obstructed. (k) The placing a floating dock in a public river has been also held to be a nuisance, though beneficial in repairing ships. (l) So where a wooden jetty was erected on piles driven into the bed of the river Thames and extended considerably beyond high-water mark, but not quite to low-water mark, it was held that this was a nuisance to the navigation. (m) So a dummy or flush-decked barge fastened by means of chains to a wharf and to a mooring stone sunk into the bed of a navigable river, so as to rise and fall with the tide, for the convenience of embarking and disembarking passengers from vessels, and without which it would have been impossible for boats to land or embark passengers at the wharf at low water, is a nuisance. (n) And the bringing a great ship into Billingsgate dock, which, though a common dock, was common only for small ships coming with provisions to the markets in London appears to have been considered as a nuisance, in the same manner as if a man were so to use a common pack and horseway with his cart, as to plough it up, and thereby render it less convenient to riders. (o) Where an Act authorises a company to erect a bridge over a public navigable river, and they erect it in such a manner as to impede the navigation, and not in compliance with the provisions of the Bridge.

Act, they are guilty of nuisance. (p) And the erection of weirs Weirs. across rivers was reprobated in the earliest periods of our law. 'They were considered as public nuisances. The words of Magna Charta are, that all weirs from henceforth shall be utterly pulled down by Thames and Medway, and through all England, &c. And this was followed up by subsequent Acts treating them as public nuisances, forbidding the erection of new ones, and the enhancing, straitening, or enlarging, of those which had aforetime existed.' (q) Upon the principle, therefore, which has been before stated (r) that the public have an interest in the suppression of public nuisances, though of long standing, it was held that a right to convert a brushwood into a stone weir (whereby fish would be prevented from passing except in flood times), was not evidenced by showing that forty years ago two-thirds of it had been so converted without interruption. (s) So in a more recent case it was holden, that twenty years' possession of the water at a given level was not conclusive as to the right. Abbott, C. J., said 'If it be admitted that this is a public navigable river, and that all his Majesty's subjects had a right to navigate it, an obstruction to such navigation for a period of twenty years would not have the effect of preventing his Majesty's subjects from using it as such.' (t) But where there was a grant of wreck from Henry 2, to the Abbey of Cerne by all their lands upon the sea confirmed by insperimus by Henry 8, and also a grant from Henry 8, of the island of Brownsea and the shores thereof, belonging to the late monastery of Cerne, together with wreck, &c.; and there was also evidence that between forty and fifty years ago the proprietor of the island of Brownsea raised an embankment across a small bay, and had ever since asserted an exclusive right to the soil without opposition; it was held, that although the usage of forty years' duration could not of itself establish such exclusive right, or destroy the rights of the public, yet it was evidence from which prior usage to the same effect might be presumed, and which, coupled with the general words contained in the grants, served to establish such right. If, however, it had appeared, that the public had a right to fish over the place in question, prior to the forty years, and that the raising the bank was an act of usurpation, the exclusive right would not have been established. (u)

At common law every holder of lands adjoining to a river or brook has a right to raise the banks of the river or brook, upon his own lands so as to confine the flood-water within the banks, provided he does not thereby occasion injury to the lands or property of other persons; and if such right has been exercised before the passing of an Act authorizing the making of a public navigable canal, the exercise of such right after the making of the canal will not be a nuisance, although it may be injurious to the canal, as the construction of the canal may be considered as having taken place subject to the enjoyment of such rights as the landholders possessed when the Act passed, except so far as the Act may have restrained such rights.

At common law the holders of lands adjoining to a river have a right to raise banks on their own lands to confine the flood-water, provided they do not thereby injure the lands of others.

Upon an indictment for a nuisance to a public canal navigation established by Act of Parliament, it was found by a special verdict that the canal was carried across a river and the adjoining valley by means of an aqueduct and an embankment, in which were several arches and culverts: that a brook fell into the river above its point of intersection with the canal, and that in times of flood the water, which was then penned back into the brook, overflowed its banks, and was carried, by the natural level of the country, to the above-mentioned arches, and through them to the river, doing, however, much mischief to the lands over which it passed; that except for the nuisance after-mentioned, the aqueduct would be sufficiently wide for the passage of the river at all times but those of high flood, notwithstanding the improved drainage of the country, which had increased the body of the water; that the defendants, occupiers of lands adjoining the river and brook, had for the protection of their lands, subsequently to the making of the canal, aqueduct, and embankment, created, or heightened, certain artificial banks, called fenders, on their respective properties, so as to prevent the flood-water from escaping as aforesaid, and that the water had consequently, in time of flood, come down in so large a body against the aqueduct and canal banks as to endanger them, and obstruct the navigation: that the fenders were not unnecessarily high, and that, if they were reduced, many hundred acres of land would again be exposed to inundation. It was held, by the King's Bench, that the defendants were not justified under these circumstances, in altering for their own benefit the course, in which the flood-water had been accustomed to run; that there was no difference in this respect between flood-water and an ordinary stream; that an action on the case would have lain at the suit of an individual for such diversion, and consequently that an indictment well lay where the act affected the public. (v) But the Court of Exchequer Chamber, although they agreed in the principle that the ancient course and outlet of the flood-water had been obstructed by the wrongful raising from time to time of the fenders by the defendants, upon which the judgment of the King's Bench proceeded, held that the special verdict ought to have found—

[381] 1st, whether the raising fenders was an ancient and rightful usage, or whether it had been commenced since the construction of the canal. For there was no doubt that at common law the landholders would have the right to raise the banks of the river and brook from time to time, as it became necessary, upon their own lands, so as to confine the flood-water within the banks, and to prevent it from overflowing their own lands; with this single restriction, that they did not thereby occasion any injury to the lands or property of other persons. And if this right had actually been exercised and enjoyed by them before the passing of the Act, then the construction of the aqueduct and embankment might be considered as having taken place subject to the enjoyment of such rights as the landholders possessed at the time of passing the Act, unless so far as the Act might have restrained the exercise of such rights. 2ndly, whether the course described by the special verdict to have been taken by the flood-water was, or was not, the ancient and rightful course. And, 3rdly, whether or not the raising of the fenders to their present height had become necessary in consequence of the construction of the aqueduct. (w)

It is no defence to an indictment for a nuisance in a navigable river and port to prove that, although the work be in some degree a hindrance to navigation, it is advantageous, in a greater degree, to other uses of the river. Where, therefore, a causeway had been made in the river Medina, which was an inconvenience to the navigation, as small vessels were much obstructed in making their way up with the tide, but it was a great benefit to the public: first, in launching and landing boats more readily; secondly, steam-boats and other vessels could approach where they could not before; thirdly, vessels obtained shelter from the quay; and the jury found it to be a nuisance, but added the inconvenience was counterbalanced by the public benefit arising from the alteration; it was held that this finding amounted to a verdict of guilty. (x)

On an indictment for a nuisance, in the navigable river Itchen, it appeared that a wharf was built between high and low-water mark, and projected over a portion of the river on which boats formerly passed; before its erection there was no means of unloading trading vessels in the river, except by lightening them in the middle of the stream and then getting them at high water on to the mud between high and low-water mark; but since its erection such vessels had been unloaded at it, and thus the centre of the river was kept clear and the general navigation improved; but Wightman, J., left it to the jury to say whether the wharf itself occasioned any impediment whatever to the navigation of the river by any description of vessels or boats, and told them that they were not to take into consideration the circumstance that a benefit had resulted to the general navigation of the river by the said channel being kept clear. (y) But there may be cases where the injury to the public is too small to support an indictment. Upon the trial of an indictment for a nuisance to a harbour by erecting and continuing piles and planking in the harbour, and thereby obstructing it and rendering it insecure, it was found by a special verdict, that 'by the defendant's works, the harbour is in some extreme cases rendered less secure;' and it was held that the defendant could not be made criminally responsible for consequences so slight, uncertain, and rare, as were stated by this verdict to result from his works. (z)

It is no defence that a nuisance may be productive of advantage to some uses of the navigation.

It is a question for the jury whether a bridge is a nuisance to the navigation in the particular locality, and if they find that it is no obstruction, that is a verdict of not guilty.

Where a new channel is made for a navigable river under an Act, the public have the same rights in it as in the river, and any nuisance to the navigation is indictable.

Cases which have been held not to be obstructions.

An Act recited that the river Witham was formerly navigable from Lincoln to the sea, but that by sand and silt brought in by the tide the outfall had been greatly obstructed, and powers were given to commissioners to restore the navigation, and they were authorized to make a new cut through lands adjoining the river, and the navigation so made was to be open to all persons paying certain tolls: the commissioners were also authorized by this and another Act to build bridges under certain regulations. The cut was made, and a more direct channel thereby created, through which the waters of the river passed to the sea. The powers of the commissioners were afterwards vested by another Act in a company, who built a bridge over the cut, not according to the regulations of the Act, upon piles fixed in the bed of the cut, and its piers occupied part of the breadth of the river; the jury were told that this was a public highway, and were desired to say whether or not the construction of the bridge was a nuisance to the navigation of the river, and they answered that they did not consider it to be an obstruction to the navigation; and it was held that there was no doubt that this was a public river; that the cut, which merely straightened the course, was in the same situation as the original channel, and the public had the same rights over it as they had over the original channel; and that if the bridge had been so built as to obstruct the navigation, it would have been an indictable offence; but that the verdict amounted to a finding of not guilty. It was for the jury to say whether an erection of this kind was a damage to the navigation or not, and the true question for them was, whether a damage accrued to the navigation in the particular locality. (a)

By the 1 Eliz. c. 17, the taking of fish, except with the particular trammels or nets therein specified, was prohibited, upon pain of the forfeiture of a certain penalty, of the fish taken, and also of the unlawful engines: and upon this Act it was contended, that a party laying certain illegal engines called bucks in his own fishery was guilty of a nuisance; but the Court held that it could not be considered as a nuisance public or private. (b)

Where a vessel has been sunk in a navigable river by accident and misfortune, no indictment can be maintained against the owner

ciently so to render the defendant criminally liable,' and thereon an acquittal was entered; it was held by Coleridge and Crompton, JJ., and semble by Lord Campbell, C. J., that the charge was to be understood as meaning, not that a party may legally commit a small nuisance, but that an obstruction might be so insignificant as not to constitute a nuisance; and that the jury must be understood as finding that the obstruction was so insignificant; and that, therefore, there was not a misdirection warranting a new trial.

(a) Reg. v. Betts, 16 Q. B. 1022. Lord Campbell asked, during the argument, 'may not there be a common law right to erect bridges not obstructing the navigation?' 'How have bridges ever been legally made over navigable rivers?' His Lordship also expressed his dissent from the opinions of the majority of the judges in Rex v. Russell, 6 B. & C. 566. And in the Mayor of Norwich v. Norfolk R. Co., 4 E. & B. 440, speaking of a nuisance to a navigable river, Lord Campbell said, 'the doctrine of compensation has not hitherto been applied in such a case to justify a public nuisance; and I have not before heard it suggested that, without the authority of Parliament, the passage of ships up and down a navigable river could be obstructed for a given period by works which might afterwards enable ships to navigate the river with increased facility. The consent of the Lords of the Admiralty, and of the riparian proprietors, could not supersede the necessity for the authority of the Legislature.' See Abraham v. G. N. R. Co., 16 Q. for not removing it. Lord Kenyon, C.J., said that the grievance had been occasioned, not by any default or wilful misconduct of the defendant, but by accident and misfortune; and that it would be adding to the calamity to subject the party to an indictment for what had proceeded from causes against which he could not guard, or which he could not prevent: and though it was urged that if he defendant was not punishable for having caused the nuisance, yet it was his duty to have removed it, and that he was liable to be indicted for not having done so, the learned judge said, that perhaps the expense of removing the vessel might have amounted to more than the whole value of the property; and that he was therefore of opinion, that the offence charged was not the subject of indictment. (c) And this decision has been fully confirmed in two cases, in which it has been held that it is the duty of a person using a navigable river with a vessel of which he is possessed and has the control, to use reasonable skill and care to prevent mischief to others, and his liability is the same whether his vessel be in motion or stationary, floating or aground, under water or above it. For in all these circumstances the vessel may continue to be in his possession and under his control. This duty arises out of the possession and control of the vessel being in him: and this liability may be transferred, with the transfer of the possession and control, to another person. And on the abandonment of such possession and control the liability ceases. And further, that from an unavoidable accident producing the wreck of a vessel, no duty arises to the owner to take any precautions or to remove the impediment to navigation which it creates. (d)

A weir appurtenant to a fishery, obstructing the whole or a part of a navigable river, is legal, if granted by the crown before the commencement of the reign of Edward I, and such a grant may be inferred from evidence of its having existed before that time. If the weir, when so first granted, obstruct the navigation of only a part of the river, it does not become illegal by the stream changing its bed, so that the weir obstructs the only navigable passage remaining. Where the crown had no right to obstruct the whole passage of a navigable river, it had no right to obstruct a part by erecting a weir, except subject to the rights of the public; and, therefore, in such a case, the weir would become illegal upon the rest of the river being so choked that there could be no passage elsewhere. In an action of trespass for throwing down a weir, the plaintiff established the existence of the weir by a royal grant made at some time prior to the time of Edward I; but it stood across part of the Severn, a public navigable river—a part, indeed, not required for the purposes of navigation at the date of the grant, but, at the time of the commission of the trespass, necessary for those purposes, by reason of the residue of the channel having become choked up. The plaintiff contended that, at the date of the grant, the crown had the power of making it, even to the disturbance or total prevention, of the right of navigation by the subject: or that, at all events, it had the power of making such a grant, if, in the then existing state of circumstances, it did not interfere with the rights of the subject: and that such a grant, valid in its inception, would not become invalid by reason of any change of circumstances, which might afterwards affect the residue of the channel. Lord Denman, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, ‘ If the subject (which this view of the case concedes) had by common law a right of passage in the channel of the river, paramount to the power of the Crown, we cannot conceive such right to have been originally other than a right locally unlimited to pass in all and every part of the channel. The nature of the highway which a navigable river affords, liable to be affected by natural and uncontrollable causes, presenting conveniences in different parts and on different sides according to the changes of wind or direction of the vessel, and attended by the important circumstance that on no one is any duty imposed by the common law to do that which would be analogous to the ordinary repair of a common highway to remove obstructions, namely, clear away sand-banks and preserve any accustomed channel — all these considerations make it an almost irresistible conclusion that the paramount right, if it existed at all, must have been a right in every part of the space between the banks. It cannot be disputed that the channel of a public navigable river is a King’s highway, and is properly so described; and, if the analogy between it and a highway by land were complete, there could be no doubt that the right would be such as we now lay down; for the right of passage in a highway by land extends over every part of it. Now, although it may be conceded that the analogy is not complete, yet the very circumstances in which it fails, are strong to show that in this respect at least it holds. The absence of any right to go extra viam in case of the channel being choked, and the want of a definite obligation on anyone to repair, only render it more important, in order to make the highway an effectual one, that the right of passage should extend to all parts of the channel. If then, subject to this right, the crown had at any period the prerogative of raising weirs in such parts as were not at the time actually required by the subject for the purposes of navigation, it follows, from the very nature of a paramount right on the one hand and a subordinate right on the other, that the latter must cease whensoever it cannot be exercised but to the prejudice of the former. If, in the present case, the subject has not at this moment the right to use that part of the channel on which the weir stands, it is only because of the royal grant; and that grant must then be alleged at its date to have done away for ever, in so much of the channel, the right of the public: but that is to suppose the subordinate right controlling that which is admitted to be paramount, which is absurd. On the other hand, there is nothing unreasonable or unjust in supposing the right to erect the weir subject to the necessities of the public when they should arise; for the right of the public being supposed to be paramount by law, the grantee must be taken to be cognizant of such right: and the same natural peculiarities, and the same absence of any obligation by law on anyone to counteract those peculiarities above-mentioned, would give him full notice of the probability that at some period his grant would be determined. We do not therefore think that the plaintiff can sustain his second point.'

With regard to the power of the crown at common law to interfere with the channels of public rivers, Lord Denman, C. J., said, 'On the one side the contention is, that prior to Magna Charta, the power of the crown was absolute over them; and that this weir, by the antiquity assigned to it by the finding of the jury, is saved from the operation of that or any succeeding statute; while, on the other, it is alleged that they are and were highways to all intents and purposes, which the crown had no power to limit or interfere with, and that as well the restraints enacted by, as the confirmations implied from, the statutes alluded to have nothing to do with the present question.'

'After an attentive examination of the authorities and the statutes referred to in the argument, we cannot see any satisfactory evidence that the power of the crown in this respect was greater at the common law before the passing of Magna Charta than it has been since. It is clear that the channels of public navigable rivers were always highways: up to the point reached by the flow of the tide the soil was presumably in the crown; and above that point, whether the soil at common law was in the crown or the owners of the adjacent lands (a point perhaps not free from doubt), there was at least a jurisdiction in the crown, according to Sir Matthew Hale, 'to reform and punish nuisances in all rivers, whether fresh or salt, that are a common passage, not only for ships and greater vessels, but also for smaller, as barges or boats': De Jure Maris, Part I., c. 2, p. 8. In either case the right of the subject to pass up and down was complete. In the case of the Bann Fishery (e), where the reporter is speaking of rivers within the flux and reflux of the tide, it is stated that this right was by the King's permission, for the ease and commodity of the people; but if this be the true foundation, and if the same may be also properly said of the same right in the higher parts of rivers, still the permission supposed must be coeval with the monarchy, and anterior to any grant by any particular monarch of the right to erect a weir in any particular river. It is difficult, therefore, to see how any such grant made in derogation of the public right previously existing, and in direct opposition to that duty, which the law casts on the crown, of reforming and punishing all nuisances which obstruct the navigation of public rivers, could have been in its inception valid at common law. Nor can we find, in the language of the statutes referred to, anything inconsistent with this conclusion. They speak indeed of acts done in violation of this public right; but they do not refer them to any power legally existing in the crown, which for the future they propose to abridge. We are, therefore, of opinion that the legality of this weir cannot be sustained on the supposition of any power existing by law in the crown in the time of Edward I. which is now taken away. But this does not exhaust the question; because that which was not legal at first may have been subsequently legalized.'

‘The learned counsel for the defendants is probably correct in saying, that the twenty-third chapter of Magna Charta may be laid out of the case. The kidelli there spoken of appear, from the 2 Inst. p. 38, and the Chester Mill Case, (f) to have been open weirs erected for the taking of fish; and the evil intended to be remedied by the statute was the unlawful destruction of that important article of consumption. That statute, therefore, being pointed at another mischief, might leave any question of nuisance by obstruction to the passage of boats exactly as it stood at common law. But the same remark does not apply to 4 stat. 25 Edw. 3, c. 4. That begins by reciting that the common passage of boats and ships in the great rivers of England is oftentimes annoyed by the inhansing [a mistranslation of the word lever for levying or setting up (g)] of gorees, mills, weirs, stanks, stakes, and kiddles, and then provides for the utter destruction of all such as have been levied and set up in the time of Edward I., and after. It further directs that writs shall be sent to the sheriffs of the places where need shall be, to survey and inquire, and to do thereof execution: and also the justices shall be thereupon assigned at all times that shall be needful. It is clear, we think, that, in any criminal proceeding for the demolition of this weir which had been instituted immediately after the passing of this statute, it would have been a sufficient defence to have shown its erection before the time of Edward 1; and, considering the concise language of statutes of that early period, we think the statute would equally have been an answer in any civil proceeding at the suit of a party injured. Assuming the weir to have been illegally erected before the date of Magna Charta, it is not unreasonable to suppose that a sort of compromise was come to: similar nuisances were probably very numerous; but they were probably, many of them, of long standing: it may have been impossible to procure, or it may well have been thought unreasonable to insist on, an Act which should direct those to be abated which had acquired the sanction of time: and a line was therefore drawn, which, preventing an increase of the nuisance for the future, and abating it in all the instances which commenced within a given period, impliedly legalized those which could be traced to an earlier period. This appears to us the proper effect to be attributed to the statute; and, if it be, it disposes of any difference between a criminal and civil proceeding. The earlier weirs were not merely protected against the specific measures mentioned in the Act, but rendered absolutely legal. If this would have been a good answer immediately after the Act passed, it is at least equally good now; and therefore, of stat. 45 Edw. 3, c. 2, and stat. 1 Hen. 4, c. 12, it is unnecessary to say more than that they do not at all weaken the defence which the defendants have under the former statute.’ (h)

SEC. IV.

Of Nuisances to Public Bridges.

THE more ancient cases do not supply any immediate definition or description in terms of what shall be considered 'public bridges.' But a distinction between a public and a private bridge is taken in one of the books, (l) and made to consist principally in its being built for the common good of all the subjects, as opposed to a bridge made for private purposes; and though the words, 'public bridges,' do not occur in the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5 (called the statute of bridges), yet as the statute empowers the justices of the peace to inquire of 'all manner of annoyances of bridges broken in the highways,' and applies to bridges of that description, in all its subsequent provisions, it may be inferred that a bridge in a highway is a public bridge for all purposes of repair connected with that statute. And 'if the meaning of the words public bridge could properly be derived from any other less authentic source than this statutable one, they might safely be defined to be such bridges as all his Majesty's subjects had used freely and without interruption, as of right, for a period of time competent to protect themselves and all who should thereafter use them, from being considered as wrong-doers in respect of such use, in any mode of proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the legality of such use might be questioned.' (m)

But a bridge built for the mere purpose of connecting a private mill with the public highway, or for any other such merely private purpose, would not necessarily become a part of the highway, although the public might occasionally participate with the private proprietor in the use of it; and it is not every sort of bridge, erected possibly for a temporary purpose, during a time of flood, that may have rendered the ordinary fords impassable, or the ordinary means of passage impracticable, which can be considered as a bridge in a highway, to be repaired, when broken down, according to the provisions of the statute of bridges. (n)

Of private bridges.

It is a question of fact, whether a particular structure be a bridge or not; and, upon a question whether an arch be a bridge or culvert, the fact that it is built over a stream of water flowing between banks, is not decisive to show that it is a bridge; although there must be such a stream for the structure to be a bridge. Neither is it decisive that it is not a bridge, that there are no parapets to it. (o) On an indictment for not repairing the highway next adjoining each end of Warmley Bridge, it appeared that the bridge was built before the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, and conveyed a turnpike road between parapet walls over a stream of water, which at that place was confined between banks, which prevented its overflowing the adjacent land in winter when the water averaged two feet and a half in depth; but the stream was never dry at any time of the year; Cresswell, J., told the jury that if they were satisfied that this structure was a bridge their verdict must be for the Crown. If it had been erected for the convenience of the public in passing over the stream, it was a county bridge, and rendered the county liable to repair it, though the bridge might not have been necessary for the convenience of the public when it was built. (p) Where an ancient foot bridge consisted of three planks nine or ten feet long, and was over a stream about a foot and a half deep in summer, but frequently deeper in winter, and had originally been repaired by a parish, it was held that this was not a county bridge. (q)

The county is bound to repair such bridges as are over flumen vel cursus aqua, i. e., water flowing in a channel between banks more or less defined, not arches over meadows.

The inhabitants of a county are bound by common law to repair bridges erected over such water as answers the description of flumen vel cursus aqua, that is, water flowing in a channel between banks, more or less defined, although such channel may be occasionally dry; they are, therefore, not bound to repair arches in a raised causeway, more than three hundred feet from the end of a bridge, through which the water passes in flood times only. Where a road, in continuation of a bridge over a river, ran through low meadow ground, liable to be flooded by the river, for five hundred and seventy-six feet from the foot of the bridge, and formed a causeway, in which were placed at different intervals, five arched openings, two of which were within three hundred feet of the bridge, which the county had always repaired, and the other three more than three hundred feet from the foot of the bridge, and the arches were built not over the ordinary stream or course of the river, but over solid meadow ground, which was subject to be much flooded, and there was generally a strong current in winter through the arches, which, by giving vent to the flood water, helped to protect the bridge, which would be in danger from the penning up of the water if the causeway had no arches; it was held that the county was not liable to repair the arches which were more than three hundred feet from the foot of the bridge. The ancient form of indictment, as mentioned in 2 Inst. 701, is, quod pons publicus et communis situs in altâ regiâ xiâ super flumen seu cursum aqua, &c., and although in many indictments in modern times the words, super flumen, &c., are omitted, yet in such indictments they must be considered as virtually included in the true import of the term bridge; for, which was usually about three feet deep, but occasionally shallower, and in flood times much deeper, and it had no battlements at either end; the jury having found a verdict of guilty upon an indictment treating this structure as part of the road, the Court refused a rule for a new trial.

See the case, post, p. 546.

otherwise, all such indictments would be bad, there being many structures, bearing the name of bridge, erected across a steep ravine, and in modern times over an ancient road, crossed in a transverse direction by a new road, having no reference to water, and which, unquestionably the county is not bound to repair; and no more certain rule can be laid down than that the words flumen vel cursus aquæ are to be considered to denote water, flowing in a channel between banks, more or less defined, although such channel may be occasionally dry. (r)

But this case has since been reconsidered. Upon an indictment against the county of Derby for the nonrepair of Swarkestone Bridge, it appeared that the bridge was a structure 1,275 yards in length, and consisted of forty-two arches, divided, at some points, by a stone causeway, at others by the piers only. The river Trent flowed constantly under five of the arches at one end of the structure, and a brook flowed constantly under an arch at the opposite end. The other arches lay across meadow land, and in times of flood the water flowed under all of them, and under most of them there was stagnant water at all times. The county had immemorially repaired the whole structure, and had rebuilt and widened twenty-two of the arches under which there was no constant stream. Parts of the whole structure, other than the five arches, had been presented at different times under the name of Swarkestone Bridge, by the grand jury, as out of repair and thereupon repaired by the county. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the county were liable to repair the whole structure; as the whole must be deemed a bridge, and there was no general rule of law that arches, under which there was no constant stream, could not form part of a county bridge, and that, where such arches are contiguous to and as it were in continuation of an acknowledged county bridge, and have been immemorially treated by the county as part of the bridge, there was no rule of law to prevent their being part of the bridge. (s)

As there may be a dedication of a road to the public: (t) so in the case of a bridge, though it be built by a private individual, in the first instance, for his own convenience, yet it may be dedicated by him to the public, by his suffering them to have the use of it, and by their using it accordingly. (u) And though, where there is such a dedication, it must be absolute, (v) yet it may be definite in point of time; so that a bridge may be a public bridge, if it be used by the public at all such times only as are dangerous to pass through the river. The county had previously been indicted for not repairing two of the same arches, which were described in the indictment as bridges; and on a special case it was held that there was not sufficient to show that they were bridges, which the county was liable to repair, as the jury had not found either that they were erected at the same time as the bridge over the river, or for the purpose of enabling the public to pass, and not for the benefit of the owners of the adjoining lands. *Rex v. except in times of flood, is conclusive evidence that the public have only a limited right to use the bridge at such times: and if an indictment for not keeping it in repair states that it is used by the King's subjects, 'at their free will and pleasure,' the variance is fatal. (x)

A bridge may be indictable as a nuisance.

But a bridge built in a public way, without public utility, is indictable as a nuisance; and so it is if built colourably in an imperfect or inconvenient manner, with a view to throw the onus of rebuilding or repairing it immediately on the county. (y)

Of nuisances to bridges by obstructions.

Where a bridge is, in the sense which has been described, a bridge in a highway, it will of course be as public as the highway itself in which it is situate, and of which, for the purpose of passage, it must be understood to form a part. (z) All actual obstructions, therefore, to such bridges will come within the rules already stated with respect to nuisances to highways by obstruction, (a) and do not require a repetition in this place. There is, however, one case where the defendant was indicted for not repairing a house adjoining to a public bridge, which he was bound to repair ratione tenuræ, but permitted it to be so much out of repair that it was ready to fall upon people passing over the bridge; it was found by a special verdict that the defendant was only tenant at will of the house: but the Court adjudged that he ought to repair, so that the public should not be prejudiced; and though not properly chargeable to repair the house ratione tenuræ, yet that the averment should be intended of the possession, and not of the service. (b)

Of nuisances to bridges by not repairing them.

The nuisances which more frequently arise to the public in respect of bridges are in the nature of nonfeasance, from the neglect to keep them in a proper state of repair.

The county is of common right liable to the repair of all public bridges; but they may show that others are liable.

As parishes are bound to repair the public ways within their district; so the inhabitants of the county at large are, primâ facie and of common right, liable to the repair of all public bridges within its limits, unless they can show a legal obligation on some other persons or public bodies to bear the burthen: (c) and this without any distinction as to foot, horse, or carriage bridges. (d) The statute of bridges shows that the burthen is primâ facie on the county; and it is exactly analogous to the liability of the parish to repair a road. (e) But a hundred or parish, or other known portion of a county, may by usage and custom be chargeable to the repair of a bridge erected within it. (f) And a corporation, aggregate, either in respect of a special tenure of certain lands, or in respect of a special prescription, and also any other persons by reason of such special tenure, may be compelled to repair them. (g) And if a part of a bridge lie within a franchise, those of the franchise may be charged with the repairs for so much: also by a special tenure a person may be charged with the repairs of one part of a bridge, and the inhabitants of the county be liable to repair the rest. (h) A prescription, that the lords of the manor ought to repair a bridge is good, being laid ratione tenuræ, by reason of the demesnes of the manor. (i) And, as the obligation is by reason of the demesnes of the manor, if part of the demesnes be granted to an individual, he will be obliged to contribute to the repairs: but the indictment may be against any of the tenants of the demesnes, and it will be no defence on an indictment against one of them that another is also liable. (k) And where an individual is liable to repair a bridge, his tenant for years, being in possession, will be under the same obligation, and liable to an indictment for the neglect. (l) We have seen that the inhabitants of a district cannot be charged ratione tenuræ, because unincorporated inhabitants cannot quâ inhabitants hold lands: and that a district cannot be charged by prescription alone, without a consideration, to repair what is not within such district. (m) As the burthen resting upon a county to repair the public bridges is exactly analogous to the liability of a parish to repair a road, it is not removed by an Act of Parliament directing trustees to lay out the tolls thereby granted in repairing roads, and empowering them to make and repair bridges. To an indictment against a county for not repairing a bridge in a highway, there was a plea that, by an Act of Parliament certain trustees were directed to lay out the tolls thereby granted in repairing the roads, and were empowered to make and repair bridges; that the bridge in question was erected by the trustees under that Act; that the trustees had been liable to repairs, and had repaired the bridge from the time it was so erected; and that they were still liable to keep it in repair: the replication traversed that they were so liable; and the Court held that the bridge having been erected for public purposes, in a public highway, the common law liability to repair attached upon the inhabitants of the county as soon as it was built; and that the plea was clearly insufficient to exonerate them, as it did not aver that the trustees had funds adequate to the repair of the bridge. The Isle of Wight is a division of the county of Southampton, but has no separate commission of the peace; before 1842 all public bridges in it, not repairable by tenure, had been repaired either by the tithings, parishes, or townships in which they were situate, or by rates in the nature of county rates levied on all the parishes and places in the island, under the following arrangement. In 1772 the island having been assessed to the general county rate with the other parts of the county, appeals were entered against that assessment, and in 1774 an arrangement was made, by consent, fixing certain proportions to be paid by the parishes in the island towards the general county rate, but leaving the expense of bridges and the house of correction to be raised by a local rate; the order of sessions being that 'the said island be thereby adjudged and declared not to be liable or subject to pay the county bridge rate or to the house of correction; the Isle of Wight agreeing to erect and maintain, from time to time, houses of correction and bridges within the said island.' After this arrangement the practice was for the county quarter sessions, on the application of the justices for the island division, to levy a rate, in the nature of a county rate, on every parish in the island for the repair of the island bridges and bridewell. There was no instance before 1842 of the application of the general county rate to the repair of an island bridge; but the justices of the island used to expend the island rate made in the manner above-mentioned on the island bridges and bridewell. A local Act, 53 Geo. 3, c. 92, appointed commissioners for the repair of the highways in the island, with the power of making assessments, and enacted that all bridges previously repaired by any parishes, &c., within the island should for ever be repaired in the same manner and by the same means as other bridges, usually called county bridges, within the said island, had been accustomed to be repaired, and that such particular parishes, &c., should be discharged from the exclusive burden of maintaining such bridges, &c. It was held that all bridges, which, when the Act passed, were repairable by the parishes, &c., in which they were situate, were for the future repairable by the county generally, and that the arrangement of 1774 did not affect the legal liability of the county; for the sessions had no authority to make such a rate upon the parishes in the island, nor could this conventional mode of dividing the performance of the legal obligation alter the right of the public, when the liability to the performance became a legal question. No indictment could be maintained against the island, which was not a district chargeable, as such, with any liability known to the law, and as the statute had expressly removed the obligation from the parishes, &c., the county was bound to repair the bridges. should be built across the Thames, and empowered S. D. to build a bridge, at his own expense, and in consideration of the great expense he would be at not only in building the bridge, but in erecting, repairing, and maintaining other matters necessary to be erected, it should be lawful for S. D., his heirs and assigns at all times thereafter to take, for pontage or toll for any passage over the bridge, certain sums; and a clause reciting that it might happen that the passage might for some time become dangerous or impracticable, enabled S. D., his heirs and assigns to provide and maintain a ferry across the river, and to take the same sums for passage over the river by it as were granted for the toll or pontage; but such ferry was not to continue longer than should be necessary for repairing or rebuilding the bridge; and the bridge was not to be a county bridge. A later Act recited that it had been found that the pontage or toll was greatly inadequate to the expense of building and keeping in repair the said bridge, and enacted that S. D., his heirs and assigns might take the tolls therein specified. In 1859 the principal arch of the bridge fell in, and the defendant, who had become proprietor of the bridge in 1829, thereupon provided and maintained a ferry across the river near to the bridge, and for passage over the ferry took the tolls authorized by the Acts; and it was held that these Acts imposed upon the defendant, as proprietor of the bridge, the duty to repair and maintain it as long as he received the tolls. (p)

In one case a question was made as to the evidence on which a jury might find that the defendants were an immemorial corporation, and liable, in their corporate character, to the repair of a bridge. The evidence was of a charter of Edw. 6, granted upon the recited prayer of the inhabitants of the borough of Stratford-upon-Avon, 'that the King would esteem them, the inhabitants, worthy to be made, reduced, and erected, into a body corporate and politic;' and thereupon proceeding to 'grant (without any word of confirmation) unto the inhabitants of the borough, that the same borough should be a free borough for ever thereafter;' and then proceeding to incorporate them by the name of the bailiffs and burgesses, &c.: and this, it was considered, would, without more, imply a new incorporation. But the same charter recited that it was an ancient borough, in which a guild was theretofore founded, and endowed with lands, out of the rents, revenues, and profits of which a school and an almshouse were maintained, and a bridge was from time to time kept up and repaired; which guild was then dissolved, and its lands lately come into the King's hands; and further recited that the inhabitants of the borough, from time immemorial, had enjoyed franchises, liberties, free customs, jurisdictions, privileges, exemptions, and immunities, by reason and pretence of the guild, and of charters, grants, and confirmations to the guild, and otherwise, which the inhabitants could not then hold and enjoy by the dissolution of the guild, and for other causes, by means whereof it was likely that the borough and its government would fall into a worse state without speedy remedy; and that thereupon the inhabitants of the borough had prayed the King's favour (for bettering the borough and government thereof, and for supporting the great charges which from time to time they were bound to sustain,) to be deemed worthy to be made, &c., a body corporate, &c.: and thereupon the King, after granting to the inhabitants of the borough to be a corporation (as before stated), granted them the same bounds and limits as the borough and the jurisdiction thereof from time immemorial had extended to: and then 'willing that the almshouse and school should be kept up and maintained as theretofore (without naming the bridge) and that the great charges to the borough and its inhabitants from time to time incident might be thereafter the better sustained and supported,' granted to the corporation the lands of the late guild. There was also parol evidence, as far back as living memory went, that the corporation had always repaired the bridge. And the Court held that, taking the whole of the charter and the parol testimony together, the preponderance of the evidence was, first, that this was a corporation by prescription, though words of creation only were used in the incorporating part of the charter of Edw. 6; and, secondly, that the burthen of repairing the bridge was upon such prescriptive corporation, during the existence of the guild, before that charter; though the guild out of their revenues had, in fact, repaired the bridge, but only in case of the corporation, and not ratione tenuræ; and that the corporation were still bound by prescription, and not merely by tenure. A verdict, therefore, against them upon an indictment for the nonrepair of the bridge, charging them as immemorially bound to the repair of it, was held to be sustainable. (q)

Kelham bridge case. Presentment and finding of jury tempore, Edw. 1. Grant of pontage,

Upon an indictment for the nonrepair of Kelham Bridge, charging the defendants ratione tenuræ, they produced at the trial a record from the treasury of the Court of the receipt of the Exchequer, setting forth a presentment in the time of Edw. 3, against the Bishop of Lincoln, who was thereby charged with the liability to repair the same bridge. The record stated a trial of this presentment at the spring assizes, 20 Edw. 3; and that the jury found that the bishop was not liable to repair the bridge, and being asked who of right was bound to repair it, said that they were entirely ignorant; but, that the bridge was built about sixty years before, and then of alms of the men of the country passing that way; and that a former Bishop of Lincoln passing through the country, charitably bestowed 40s. on the workmen of the said bridge, and not in any other manner. The defendants also put in a writ of privy seal, dated 28th of June, 20 Edw. 3, granting to the men of Kelham for three years, customs for things for sale passing the said bridge, in order to repair the said bridge. It was held, that these documents were material to the issue, and good evidence towards proving it. It was argued that the ignorance of the jury of any other liability, and their statement of the origin of the bridge, and the manner in which the bishop had contributed, by way of charity and not upon compulsion, were beyond their province: but the Court thought it could not be assumed that at the remote period of this inquiry, the functions of a jury were bounded within the same limits as at present; every lawyer, indeed, knew that the contrary was the fact; with the reasonable presumption therefore, which must always be made in favour of the regularity of proceedings conducted by proper authority, it might not be too much to hold that this inquest was a public proceeding, in which the jury might properly inquire, not only whether the person charged, but also in general who, and whether any one was liable to the repairs. At the same time there was no necessity for going this length; because, even if there should be some irregularity in setting forth some particulars not inquired of, that could not vitiate what was correctly done. The facts then, that the bishop was presented as chargeable by the men of Kelham, acting for the public, that such presentment ended with his acquittal on that ground, and that it was shortly followed by the grant of pontage to the men of Kelham for the same repairs, were strong to negative any immemorial liability ratione tenuræ, because the Court must suppose that the presentment would rather have been made against the person so liable than against the bishop; and that the grant of pontage would not have been made at all. (r)

The 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 1, called the Statute of Bridges, and made in affirmance of the common law, enacts that the justices of the peace in every shire, franchise, city, or borough, or four of them, whereof one to be of the quorum, may inquire and determine, in their general sessions, of all manner of annoyances of bridges broken in the highways; and make such process and pains on every presentment against the persons as ought to be charged for the making or amending of such bridges as the King's Bench is used to do, or as it shall seem by their discretions to be necessary and convenient. Secs. 2, 3 enact, that where it cannot be known what hundred, city, town, &c., ought to make such bridges decayed, they shall, if without city, or town corporate, be made by the inhabitants of the shire or riding; and if within any city or town corporate, then by the inhabitants of such city or town corporate; and that if part shall be in one shire, &c., and part in another, the inhabitants of each shall repair and make such part as lies within their respective limits. Sec. 9 enacts, that such parts of highways as lie next adjoining to the ends of bridges by the space of three hundred feet, shall be amended as often as need shall require; and that the justices, or four of them, whereof one to be of the quorum, within their several limits, may inquire and determine, in their general sessions, all annoyances therein, and do in everything concerning the same in as ample a manner as they may do for making and repairing bridges, by virtue of the Act. (s) No private bridges are within purview of this statute, but only such as are common in the highways where all the king's liege people have or may have passage. (t) Unless the justices of a town, &c., be four in number, and one of the quorum, they have no jurisdiction under this statute. But the justices of the county in which such town (not being a county of itself, and not having the number of justices), shall lie, may

The term, 'riding,' in the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, is not to be restrained to districts called by that name, but any division of a county, which corresponds in its definition to that of a riding, is to be included within it. The Isle of Ely, therefore, is included within that term; and it is sufficient in an indictment for the nonrepair of a bridge within the Isle of Ely to allege that the bridge is in the Isle of Ely, out of repair, and that the inhabitants of the Isle of Ely ought to repair it. (v)

Where the county of a city is enlarged it may be liable to repair a bridge in the district so added.

Bridges included in boroughs by the Reform Act.

It appears also to have been holden, that where the King enlarges the boundaries of a city, by annexing part of the county to the county of the city, the enlarged part is to be considered as parcel of the old county of the city, so as to charge its inhabitants with the repairs of bridges which were situate, at the time when the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, was made, within the county at large. The point was put upon the ground that the statute lays no absolute charge till a bridge is in decay; so that though, when the statute was made, the bridges in question were within the county of Norfolk, yet, as they were not then in decay, the statute had no operation upon them before they were annexed to the city of Norwich. (w) But where a borough incorporated by charter with a non-intromittant clause, was enlarged under the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64, and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 7, by the addition of a parish in the same county containing a bridge, which until that time the county had repaired, and there was no evidence that the borough had ever been used to maintain any bridge, it was held that the transfer of the new district did not render the borough liable to repair the bridge. (x)

The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 64, s. 5, recites that by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, certain bridges and parts of bridges have been included within cities and boroughs, which bridges before that Act were maintained as to the whole or such parts thereof as were within such cities or boroughs by the inhabitants thereof, and the remaining bridges and parts of bridges which were not situate within such limits were maintained by the counties or ridings respectively adjoining thereto, and enacts that 'every bridge which is wholly or in part included within the boundary of any such city or borough, the inhabitants whereof, before the passing of the said recited Act, were by prescription or otherwise liable to and did maintain the bridges and parts of bridges within their respective cities and boroughs, shall as to the whole of such bridges, if the same is (sic) wholly within the limits of such city or borough, or as to such part as is within the limits of such city or borough, if part only is within such limits, be maintained, altered,

But though the inhabitants of a county, by common right, and other persons, by the obligations which have been mentioned, are bound to repair existing bridges, no person can be compelled to build, or contribute to the building, any new bridge, without an Act of Parliament; nor can the inhabitants of a county, by their own authority, change a bridge or highway from one place to another. (z) Before the 14 Geo. 2, c. 33, the justices at the sessions had no authority to change the situation of bridges: but by that statute they were empowered, at their quarter sessions, to purchase any piece of land adjoining or near to any county bridge, within the limits of their respective commissions, for the more commodious enlarging or convenient rebuilding the same; but the land was not to exceed an acre for any such bridge. (a) It was considered by a very learned judge, that this statute impliedly enabled the magistrates to alter the position of bridges to suit the convenience of the public: (b) but a more recent statute expressly gives them that power where bridges are so much in decay as to require to be taken down. The 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 2, enacts, 'that where any bridge or bridges, or roads at the ends thereof, repaired at the expense of any county, shall be narrow and inconvenient, it shall and may be lawful to and for the justices at any of their general quarter sessions, to order and direct such bridge or bridges and roads to be widened, improved, and made commodious for the public; and that where any bridge or bridges, repaired at the expense of any county, shall be so much in decay as to render the taking the same wholly down necessary or expedient, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said justices, at any of their said general quarter sessions, to order and direct the same to be rebuilt, either on the old site or situation, or in any new one more convenient to the public, contiguous to or within two hundred yards of the former one, as to such justices shall seem meet.' And the statute also provides for the purchasing of land necessary for such purposes, not exceeding an acre at any one bridge; and for assessing a compensation for such land, by means of a jury, where the surveyor cannot agree for the price with the owner, in the same manner as was done by the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, (c) in relation to highways. By 54 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 1, these provisions, relating to the purchase of land, are extended to such buildings and other erections as may be necessary to be purchased for the purposes of the 43 Geo. 3; and the provisions of the 43 Geo. 3 (except such as relate to bridges thereafter to be re-erected), (d) are extended as well to bridges, and the roads at the ends thereof, repaired by the inhabitants of hundreds, and other general divisions in the nature of hundreds, as to bridges and the roads at the ends thereof, repaired by the inhabitants of counties. The 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 107, reciting that ‘many bridges on turnpike roads are, by prescription, liable to be repaired by certain parishes, and not by the county or counties in which they are situated, and which bridges, from change of times and circumstances, are become no longer sufficiently convenient for the use of the public, without being enlarged or otherwise improved,’ enacts, that ‘it shall be lawful for any such county or counties, parish or parishes, respectively, to enter into a composition or agreement with each other, and by the authority of those persons who shall be legally competent to make rates for such county and parish respectively, whereby the improvement and future repair of any such bridge shall be undertaken, and lie upon the county or counties in which such bridge is locally situated; and that all rates made for carrying into effect any such composition, agreement, repairs, or improvement, shall be made and assessed in the same manner as other the rates of such county or parish respectively, and shall be good and valid to all intents and purposes in the law whatsoever.’

Pulling down

Where the justices of the county of Dorset had contracted for the building of a new bridge in a different site, in lieu of the old one, which was ruinous; and had directed the old bridge to be taken down before the new one was passable, for the benefit of the old materials, which were to be used by the contractor in finishing the new bridge; the Court refused a writ of prohibition to them, to restrain them from pulling down the old bridge before the new one was passable; and this, though there were strong affidavits of the inconvenience and loss which would be sustained by the people in the neighbourhood, by being obliged to use a circuitous way in the interval. And they referred the complainants to the ordinary remedy by indictment, if the pulling down the old bridge, under these circumstances, were a nuisance. (e)

to the repair of bridges built by private persons, which become of public con-

The question, whether the inhabitants of a county, from their common law liability to the repair of public bridges, are liable to repair a bridge not originally built by them, appears to have been formerly a subject of much discussion. But, after able argument and great consideration, the principle was established ‘that if a man build a bridge, and it become useful to the county in general, the county shall repair it.’ (f) Upon this principle, where the inhabitants of a township took down an ancient foot-bridge, which they were bound to repair, and built another, for horses and carriages, in a different and more commodious part of the river, which became afterwards of general public utility, it was held that this bridge should be repaired by the county, and not by the township. (g) And the same principle of the public being obliged to support a bridge of public utility has been acted upon in many subsequent cases. Thus the county was held liable to repair a bridge erected in the King’s highway, which about forty years before had been erected by an individual, for his private benefit and utility, and for making a commodious way to his tin-works, upon proof that the public had constantly used the bridge from the time of its being built. (h) And where an old foot-bridge had been enlarged, in the first instance to a horse-bridge, and afterwards to a carriage-bridge, by a township, at their expense, it was recognized as the general law that where a township, or any private individuals, build a new bridge, and dedicate it to the public benefit, and it is used by the public, the onus of repairing it falls upon the county at large. (i) In a case also where the doctrine was fully investigated and considered, it was held that the county or riding was liable to the repair of a bridge built by trustees under a turnpike Act, there being no special provision for exonerating them from the common law liability, or transferring it to others. (k)

Where it appeared that Queen Anne, in the year 1708, for her greater convenience in passing to and from Windsor Castle, built a bridge over the Thames, at Datchet, in the common highway leading from London to Windsor, in lieu of an ancient ferry, with a toll, which belonged to the crown; and she and her successors maintained and repaired the bridge till 1796, when, being in part broken down, the whole was removed, and the materials converted to the use of the King, by whom the ferry was re-established as before; it was held that the bridge was a public one, repairable by the inhabitants of the county. (l) And where the facts were, that a person about forty-five years before had erected a mill, and dam thereto, for his own profit, by which means he deepened the water of a ford through which there was a public highway, but the passage through which was, before the deepening, very inconvenient at times to the public, and the miller had afterwards built a bridge over it, which the public had ever since used; it was decided that the county, and not the miller, were chargeable with the reparation. (m) In this case the Court was much pressed by an ancient authority to this effect: 'If a man erect a mill for his own profit, and make a new cut for the water to come to it, and make a new bridge over it, and the subjects use to go over this as over a common bridge; this bridge ought to be repaired by him who has the mill, and not by the county, because he erected it for his own benefit.' (n) And as that authority seemed to constitute an anomaly in the law, and to be at variance with all the cases, the record of the case was examined. From this it appeared that the real question was on an obligation to repair by reason of the tenure of certain lands; and that no such question as was supposed, namely, of a legal obligation resulting from the building of the bridge by the mill owner for his benefit, was ever directly or indirectly decided, or could properly have been argued. (o) Relieved, therefore, from this case, the Court considered the authorities from first to last as uniform; and as establishing the doctrine that if a private person build a private bridge, which afterwards becomes of public convenience, the county is bound to repair it. (p)

In these cases there is always that which is to be considered as an acquiescence by the county. The county is not liable, except for bridges made in highways; and as the making of the bridge, and thereby obstructing the road while the bridge is making, may be treated as a nuisance, and the county may, if it think fit, stop its progress by indictment, the forbearing to prosecute in that way is an acquiescence by the county in the building of the bridge. (q)

A bridge built without public utility, or colourably to charge the county, may be a nuisance.

Counties are not to be charged with the repairs of bridges built after the passing of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, unless built to the satisfaction of the county surveyor.

But though a bridge built by an individual may thus become public, yet it will not become so from the mere circumstance of its being built in a public way; and it appears to have been considered that a bridge built in a public way, without public utility, or built colourably in an imperfect or inconvenient manner, with a view to throw the burthen of rebuilding or repairing it immediately on the county, may be indicted as a nuisance. (r) A protection is also given to counties by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, from the burthen of repairing certain bridges, erected after the 24th June, 1803. For the more clearly ascertaining the description of bridges, which inhabitants of counties shall be liable to repair and maintain, sec. 5 enacts, 'that no bridge hereafter to be erected or built in any county, by or at the expense of any individual or private person or persons, body politic or corporate, shall be deemed or taken to be a county bridge, or a bridge which the inhabitants of any county shall be compellable or liable to maintain or repair, unless such bridge shall be erected in a substantial and commodious manner, under the direction or to the satisfaction of the county surveyor, or person appointed by the justices of the peace at their general quarter sessions assembled, or by the justices of the peace of the county of Lancaster, at their annual general sessions; and which surveyor, or person so appointed, is hereby required to superintend and inspect the erection of such bridge, when thereunto requested by the party or parties desirous of erecting the same; and in case the said party or parties shall be dissatisfied, the matter shall be determined by the said justices respectively at their next general quarter sessions, or at their annual general sessions in the county of Lancaster.' (s) It has been observed, upon this statute, that as it was passed to limit the liability of the county to those cases only where the new bridge is substantially built, it shows sufficiently, that by the common law they would otherwise be liable to the repair of all the new bridges which might be erected within their district. (t)

Where an ancient bridge in the Isle of Wight had always been repaired by the tithing, in which it was situate, down to the passing of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 92, under the circumstances mentioned in a former page, (u) and in 1814 after the passing of that Act, the bridge being out of repair, the justices for the island caused a bridge of greater width than the old one to be built in a different position, higher up the river, and the expense was paid out of the local rate ordered by the quarter sessions of the county in the manner mentioned at a former page, (v) and levied on the inhabitants of the island, but the directions of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, were not complied with; it was held that the county was liable to repair the new bridge. (w)

Upon an indictment for the nonrepair of a bridge, it appeared that the bridge had been widened subsequently to the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, by the trustees of a turnpike road; the bridge had originally been built by them, but had not before been chargeable to the county. The statutes under which they had acted gave them a discretionary power to erect bridges; and the funds of the trusts were made applicable to the repairs. The public had used the bridge in its present state for a number of years; the jury found that it was necessary to have a bridge or culvert for the passage of a stream at the place in question; that a bridge was better for the public; but that a culvert would suffice, and would be beneficial. It was objected that this was substantially a bridge erected since the 43 Geo. 3, and not having been built under the direction of the county surveyor, the county was not liable to repair it. But the Court held that the county were liable; the bridge existed and was used by the public before the Act, and the county were bound to repair it; the trustees widened it after the Act came into force, but it continued the same bridge. The case of a bridge widened, as in the present instance, appears not to have occurred to the legislature; at all events, it is not within the words of the section. As to the finding of the jury, as they were of opinion that a bridge was better than a culvert, the verdict of guilty was right. (x)

Where before the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, there had been a bridge used as a carriage-bridge, and which the county repaired; the abutments on each side of the river were of stone, but all the rest of the bridge was wood; in 1807 the wooden part of the bridge was, during a flood, carried some distance down the river, but the abutments remained, and such part of the old wooden work as was fit for the purpose, together with some new materials, were replaced on the abutments at the expense of the parish, and the bridge was made about two feet wider than it was before, and the bridge had ever since been used by the public; it was held that this was substantially the same bridge as that which existed before 1807, and that the county were liable to repair it. A bridge built before the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, but widened since, is not a new bridge within that Act.

Bridge washed away and replaced by a parish.

The words of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 5, comprehend every kind of persons, by whom or at whose expense a bridge is built. Where, therefore a bridge was erected after the passing of the Act, by trustees appointed by a local turnpike Act, but not under the direction or to the satisfaction of the county surveyor, &c., it was held that it was not a bridge which the county was bound to repair. (z)

Cases where counties have been holden not to be liable to repair bridges built by companies or trustees under particular Acts of Parliament.

It may be useful shortly to notice a few cases in which counties have been holden not to be liable to repair certain bridges built by companies or trustees under particular Acts of Parliament.

Where the Medway Navigation Company, being empowered under a local Act to make the river navigable, and to take tolls, and 'to amend or alter such bridges or highways as might hinder the passage or navigation, leaving them or others as convenient in their room,' had, forty years before, destroyed a ford across the river in the common highway, by deepening its bed, and built a bridge over the same place; it was held that they were bound to keep such bridge in repair, as under a continuing condition to preserve the new passage in lieu of the old one, which they destroyed for their own benefit. (a)

A case not distinguishable in principle from the foregoing was decided shortly afterwards. A canal company, authorized by an Act of Parliament to make the river Bain navigable, and to make and enlarge certain navigable cuts, and build bridges and other works connected with the navigation, made a navigable cut, and deepened a ford which crossed the highway, for their own benefit, and thereby rendered a bridge necessary for the passage of the public, which was accordingly built at the expense of the company in the first instance: and it was held that the company (who were found to have profitable funds for the purpose) were bound to maintain it. (b)

The 49 Geo. 3, c. 84, appoints trustees for taking down the old and building a new bridge over the river Tone, and empowers them to take tolls; and enacts, that it shall be lawful for them, out of the monies received, to build a new bridge, &c., and vests the property in the old and new bridge, during the continuance of the Act, in the trustees; and further enacts, that as soon as the purposes of the Act shall be executed, then and from thenceforth the tolls shall cease, and the bridge, &c., shall be repaired by such persons as are by law liable to repair the old bridge. Upon this statute it was decided that, during the time the trustees were engaged in executing the powers of the Act, and before they had completed them, the county was not liable to repair the bridge. (c)

The commissioners appointed by the 22 Car. 2, to make the river Waveney navigable, were authorized to cut through any land they thought fit, and make channels. They cut through a highway; and that cut made a bridge over it necessary for the public, though such bridge was of no use to the navigation. A bridge was accordingly made, but by whom did not appear; and the bridge being out of repair, an indictment was preferred against the proprietor of the navigation (who received tolls upon the navigation) for not repairing it. Upon a case reserved, he contended, that he was not liable: but the Court held clearly that he was; for by the act of his predecessors the bridge was made: they cut, not for public purposes, but for private benefit; and the county could not be called upon, for it could be no advantage to them to have a bridge in lieu of solid ground. (d)

To an indictment against the Isle of Ely, for not repairing a bridge situated within it, the defendants pleaded that the river, over which the bridge was erected, was an artificial cut made across an existing highway by the Adventurers for the purpose of draining the Bedford Level, by virtue of certain powers under a commission of sewers; that the said river intersected and rendered wholly impassable the said highway, and that the Adventurers, under the powers aforesaid, erected the said bridge over the said river to enable the public to pass as they otherwise would have done; that the river was made for the benefit of the Adventurers, and was maintained by them until the 15 Car. 2, c. 17, when the property in the river and its banks, and in the bridge, and in the lands benefited by the river, became vested in the corporation of the Conservators of the Fens; and that the river was from that time maintained by the corporation for their own benefit, and that they have continually repaired the said bridge, and still are liable to repair the same; and upon demurrer the Court of Queen's Bench held that this plea disclosed a valid defence. And Patteson, J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Court, said, 'the principle appears to be this, undoubtedly a just one, that where the act making the bridge necessary, though authorized to be done, interferes with the public rights, and is done primarily for private purposes, and the public use, from which the public benefit is inferred, is to be referred only to the act, because made necessary by it, the public, indeed, remaining only with the same convenience which it had before, the authority to do the act is conditional only, equally whether the condition be expressed or implied; and the condition also is in both cases continuing so long as the act continues whereby the public right is interfered with. And as the obligation here insisted on arises from the party's own act, which would be unlawful unless such obligation could be complied with, the case steers clear of any consideration as to the existence of funds: for the party bringing the duty upon himself for his own purpose cannot object the want of funds for the performance of it. It appears to us, that when the Adventurers first cut the drain, and interrupted the public highway, that act, however authorized by commissioners of sewers or other power vested in them, was done for their own use, benefit, and convenience, and could be legal only on the condition of substituting another highway, which could be only by a bridge as convenient for the public as the old highway; (e) that the public were in truth no gainers by the change;

Where an artificial cut is made across a highway for private purposes and a bridge built over it, the parties making the cut are liable for the repairs of the bridge.

(d) Reg. v. Kerrison, 3 M. & S. 526.

(e) The words in the report are, 'as the old one,' obviously an error.

they were by this hypothesis merely placed in the same situation as before; and that the condition which was necessary to legalize the first cutting of the drain was and is a continuing one: the instant it is broken, the indefeasible rights of the public revive, and the cut becomes a nuisance. We think, therefore, that the plea is in substance good.' (f)

Of the liability to repair the 300 feet of the roads adjoining to the ends of bridges.

The party liable to repair the bridge is primâ facie liable to repair the approaches.

It has been seen, (g) that by the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, it is enacted, that such parts of highways as lie next adjoining to the ends of bridges, by the space of three hundred feet, shall be amended as often as need shall require; but it does not say by whom they shall be amended. It proceeds, however, to provide that the justices may inquire and determine and do in everything concerning the same in as ample a manner as they may do for making and repairing bridges by virtue of that Act. (g) As early as the reign of Edw. 3, the judges understood the approaches to a bridge to be, as it were, excrescences of the bridge itself, and that the charge of repairing them was considered as belonging, primâ facie, to the party charged with the repair of the bridge itself. To an indictment against an abbot, for the non-repair of a bridge, he pleaded that he was only bound to repair two arches of it, and the jury found that he was bound only to the repair of two arches, and the bridge over the stream of the water, et non fines ejusdem pontis. This was pleaded by him to a second indictment, and the record read: yet Knivet, J., said, 'We intend that you are bound to repair the bridge, and the highway applying to the one end and to the other; although the soil be in another, because the easement shall be preserved for the people.' (h) It has been decided, upon the authority of the preceding case, that by the common law, declared and defined by this statute, and other subsequent statutes, (i) the inhabitants of a county liable to the repair of a public bridge are liable also to repair to the extent of three hundred feet of the highway at each end of it; and that, if indicted for not repairing such highway, they can only exonerate themselves by pleading specially that some other is bound to repair it by prescription or tenure. (k) And it seems that private persons are equally liable. (l)

Where the liability to repair the bridge attaches, the liability to repair the approaches follows as a consequence.

It may be considered settled that where the liability to repair a bridge attaches by the general law, the liability to repair the approaches to the bridge for the space of three hundred feet follows the same rule. A corporation, therefore, liable by prescription, to repair a bridge, is also, primâ facie, liable to repair the highway to the extent of three hundred feet at each end; and such presumption is not rebutted by proof that the corporation have been known only to repair the bridge, and that the only repairs known to have been done to the highway have been performed by commissioners under a turnpike road Act. The corporation of Lincoln, which is a county of itself, had, from time immemorial, exclusively repaired the fabric of a bridge, and were liable by prescription to repair it, but there was no evidence that any part of the highway at each end of the bridge had ever been repaired by the corporation, or by the parish in which it was situated, but the whole of the highway, including the part of it which passed over the bridge, had, as far back as living memory went, been repaired by commissioners under a turnpike Act of the 29 Geo. 2, c. 84; it was contended, that a prescriptive liability was independent of the common law, and must, in each case, be measured by its own exact limits, which, in the present instance, were confined to the bridge itself. But as nothing appeared, by which the liability to repair the approaches, as parcel of the prescriptive liability to repair the bridge, was excluded; and as the nonrepair by the parish, or the county, and the nonrepair, de facto, by the defendants, when explained by the repairs having been done for a great number of years, by a body created by a modern act, were both consistent with a prescriptive charge, de jure, having been all the time existing and binding on the defendants; it was held, that in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the prescription to repair the bridge must be intended to include within it the repair of the approaches to it, upon the same principle, which has united the approaches of the bridge to the bridge itself, in the case of a common law liability, that, namely, of rendering complete the benefit to the public, from the repair of the bridge itself. (m)

But where a new and substantial bridge, of public utility, was built within one county, and adopted by the public, it was held that the inhabitants of that county were bound to repair it, although it was built within three hundred feet of an old bridge, repairable by the inhabitants of another county, who were bound as a matter of course under the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, to maintain three hundred feet of road adjoining to their bridge, though it lay in the other county. The Court said, that while the space where the bridge was built continued a road, it was repairable as part of the old bridge; but that when there was a substantial bridge built upon it, such bridge was repairable, as a bridge by the inhabitants of the county in which it was situated, according to the statute. (n)

But now by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 21, 'if any bridge shall hereafter (o) be built, which bridge shall be liable by law to be repaired by and at the expense of any county or part of any county, then and in such case all highways leading to, passing over, and next adjoining to such bridge shall be from time to time repaired by the parish, person, or body politic or corporate, or trustees of a turnpike road, who were by law before the erection of the said bridge bound to repair the said highways: provided nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to exonerate or discharge any county or any part of any county from repairing or keeping in repair the walls, banks, or fences of the raised causeways and raised approaches to any such bridge, or the land arches thereof.'

must make them of such height and strength as shall be answerable for the course of the water, whether it continues in the old channel, or makes a new one; and that they are not punishable as trespassers for entering on any adjoining land for such purpose, or for laying on the materials requisite for such repairs. (p) The Court of King's Bench once intimated, that if a bridge used for carriages, though formerly adequate to the purpose intended, were not of a sufficient width to meet the present public exigencies, owing to the increased width of carriages, the burthen of widening it must be borne by those who are bound to repair the bridge: (q) but in the House of Lords, on error, this point was considered as doubtful. (r) And, it has since been held, that the obligation upon a county is only to repair a bridge to the extent to which that bridge has been originally given to the public, and that they are not bound to widen it. (s)

The taxing and collecting monies for the repairing of bridges, and the highways, at the ends thereof, were first regulated by 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, and afterwards by the 1 Anne, stat. 1, c. 18, by which the justices at their quarter sessions were empowered, upon presentment of any bridge being out of repair, to make assessments upon every town or place within their commissions for the charges of the repairs. The 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, s. 1, for the better collection of such monies, appointed that they should be paid out of the general county rate; but sec. 13 enacted, that no money should be applied to the repair of any bridge, until a presentment should be made by the grand jury of its want of reparation. The 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 2, also enacted, that no money should be applied to such purposes until presentment made of the insufficiency or want of reparation of such bridges. The 52 Geo. 3, c. 110, and 55 Geo. 3, c. 143, make alterations in this respect, and sec. 5 of the latter Act enacts, that 'it shall and may be lawful to and for the justices of the peace of any county, city, riding, division, town corporate, or liberty, at their general quarter sessions respectively, to contract and agree, or to authorize any other person or persons to contract and agree, with any person or persons, for the maintaining and keeping in repair any county or hundred bridge, and the road over such county or hundred bridge, and so much of the roads at the ends thereof as are by law liable to be repaired at the expense of any such county, hundred, city, riding, division, town corporate, or liberty, or any part of the same; and the said justices are hereby empowered to order such sum or sums of money as may be contracted for and agreed to be paid for the repairing, amending, and supporting such bridges, and the roads over the same, or the ends thereof, to be paid (in cases where the county is liable to the repair thereof) by the treasurer of the county out of the county rate: or (in cases where the hundred is liable to the

By the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 49, the justices in sessions may borrow money for repairing county bridges on the credit of the county rate, and may charge the rate with interest on the money borrowed, and with the payment of such further sum as shall secure the repayment of the money borrowed in fourteen years. By the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 64, provision is made for the repairs and rebuilding of bridges within cities corporate and boroughs, under the control of the councils of such cities and boroughs, and for the borrowing of money for such purposes. By the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 3, it was provided that where part of a county bridge shall be in one shire, &c., and part in another, the inhabitants of each shire, &c., shall be contributory. (t) It has been questioned whether a borough, which has no bridge within its own limits, be not liable to contribute to the repairs of a county bridge. (u) Where certain townships had enlarged a bridge to a carriage bridge, which they were before bound to repair as a foot bridge, it was held that they should still be liable to repair pro rata. (v) So where a carriage bridge had been built before 1119, and certain abbey lands had been ordained for its repair, and the proprietors of those lands had always repaired the bridge so built; and in 1736 the trustees of a turnpike road, with the consent of a certain number of the proprietors of the abbey lands, constructed a wooden bridge along the outside of the parapet of the carriage bridge, partly connected with it by brickwork and iron pins, and partly resting on the stone work of the bridge; it was held that this foot bridge was not parcel of the carriage bridge, which the proprietors of the abbey lands were bound to repair, but that the county was liable to repair it. The methods of appointing surveyors, &c., for effecting the repairs or rebuilding of bridges, and the powers given to such surveyors, and persons employed under contracts, to procure materials for such purposes, are contained in different Acts of Parliament, the provisions of which do not fall within the object of this work. (x)

(t) This provision is alluded to by Lord Mansfield, C. J., in Rex v. Weston, 4 Burr. 2511, and by counsel arguendo in Rex v. Clifton, 5 T. R. 501, 2. The usual proceeding at this time appears to be to indict each county separately, for neglecting to repair its own division.

Proceedings for nuisances to bridges by information, presentment, or indictment.

Where those upon whom the liability rests of repairing public bridges neglect their duty, such nonfeasance is a nuisance to the public, punishable by information, presentment, or indictment. An information was held to lie in the Court of King's Bench for the nonrepair of a bridge in a case where it was considered that the 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, gave only a concurrent, but not an exclusive, jurisdiction to the sessions; (y) but probably it would not be granted, except in some cases of a peculiar nature, in which the Court might be satisfied that the purposes of justice would not be effected by an indictment. (z) The more usual course of proceeding is by indictment or presentment. (a)

A presentment may still be made.

Although the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, repeals the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, which enabled a justice on his own view to present a highway which was out of repair, that enactment is kept alive as to county bridges by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, which extended the enactments of the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, to county bridges so far as applicable thereto, and consequently a single justice may still present a bridge out of repair on his own view. (b)

Proceedings of justices in sessions.

The 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 1, gave power to the justices of the peace to hear and determine, in their general sessions, all annoyances of bridges broken in the highways, and to make process, &c., as the King's Bench used to do. By sec. 5, where any bridge is in one shire, and the persons or lands which ought to be charged are in another shire; or where the bridge is within a city, or town corporate, and the persons or lands that ought to be charged are out of the said city; the justices of such shire, city or town corporate, shall have power to hear and determine such annoyances, being within the limits of their commission; and if the annoyance be presented, then to make process into every shire of the realm against such as ought to repair the same, and to do further in every behalf as they might do if the persons or lands chargeable were in the same shire, city, or town corporate where the annoyance is.

Any particular inhabitant or inhabitants of a county, or tenant or tenants of land chargeable with the repairs of a public bridge, may be indicted for not repairing it, and will be liable to pay the whole fine assessed by the Court for the default of such repairs; and will be put to their remedy at law for a contribution from those who are bound to bear a proportionable share in the charge. (c) It is sufficient, in an indictment against a parish, to allege that the inhabitants thereof have from time whereof, &c., repaired and amended, and have been used and accustomed, &c., without stating any other ground of liability. (d) And so it is against a hundred, although it appears that a township has been annexed to it by statute within time of legal memory, such statute providing that the inhabitants of the township should do everything the same as the inhabitants of the hundred did, or were bound to do. (c) In the case of a corporation, if it were alleged that the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses had from time immemorial repaired, and it appeared that there was a period when the corporation was not so constituted, it would be bad. In such a case, the proper way would be, to allege that the corporation had immemorially repaired; and then, however constituted the corporate body might have been at different periods, the allegation would be sustained. (f) The indictment ought to show what sort of bridge it is; whether for carts and carriages, or for horses or foot-men only; and if the duty to repair arise by reason of the tenure of certain lands, the indictment must show where those lands lie. (g) An indictment charging an individual with the repair of a bridge, by reason of his being owner and proprietor of a certain navigation, is not equivalent to charging him ratione tenuræ, but it is erroneous; and it seems that a count, charging an individual by reason of being owner of a navigation under a private Act of Parliament, must set forth the Act; and it is not sufficient to state that such party is chargeable, by being owner and proprietor of the property subject to the charge. (h) In presentments by the grand jury, it is said that there is no occasion to show who ought to repair; and that it is sufficient if the defect be shown, and the bridge stated to be public. (i) Where an indictment alleged that the defendant, and those whose estate he had in a certain mill, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, had repaired, and it appeared that the mill did not exist before the time of Hen. 8, it was held, that the liability from time out of memory was disproved. (k)

An indictment alleged that ‘from time whereof,’ &c., ‘there hath been and still is a certain common and public bridge over the river Cherwell,’ and that the inhabitants of the township of A. E. had repaired and of right ought to repair the part of the said bridge which lies in the said township. It appeared that the arch of the bridge was down to 1806 only nine feet wide as to breadth of road, but was widened in that year to the breadth of fifteen feet at the expense of the township. The road over it was a carriage road both before and after the widening. The defendants before the trial gave a written admission that the bridge in question was such a bridge as was described in the indictment. It was objected that the addition of six feet in width, the repair of which must devolve on the county, was such an alteration that the prescriptive liability to repair the said part situate in the said township was negatived by the proof; but the Court of Queen’s Bench held that there was no misdescription. Either the whole of the bridge, including the added part, was still an ancient bridge, and the liability the same as before; or the new part was severable, so that there was an ancient bridge and something else. And either state of things would support the allegation. (l)

There is no doubt that an indictment will lie against a corporation aggregate for the nonrepair or obstruction of a public bridge, (m) or against any members of such corporation who cause an obstruction to a public bridge. (n)

The indictment should be against the occupier of lands liable to repair a bridge.

As the occupier of land charged with the repair of a bridge, is undoubtedly liable to the performance of that duty, it is prudent to prefer the indictment against such occupier, and not against the owner, concerning whose liability doubts have arisen. (o) In a late case (p) the Court of Queen's Bench said, 'With respect to the liability at common law to the repair of bridges ratione tenuræ, the result of the authorities seems to be to throw the charge ultimately upon the owner, though primarily, as far as the public are concerned, the occupier may be the person chargeable by indictment in case of nonrepair, (q) and it would seem from those authorities that if the owner of land charged with the repair of a bridge ratione tenuræ suffer it to be out of repair, and the occupier of the land be indicted and fined, he would be entitled to look for reimbursement to the owner, who ought to have repaired, and who holds the land by the service of repairing the bridge.'

Where an infant, eleven years old, inherited land charged with the repair of a bridge, and his guardian in socage resided on the land, but the infant did not, except occasionally; it was held, that although the infant was actually seised, yet being so by the possession of his guardian, he was not such an owner or occupier of the land, as to be chargeable by indictment for the nonrepair of the bridge, but that the guardian was such an owner and occupier. (r)

It seems that, if there were no other person against whom performance of the repairs of a bridge could be enforced, infancy would not exempt a party, liable in other respects, from an indictment for nonrepair. (r)

Of the plea.

It is laid down, that it is not sufficient for the defendants in an indictment for not repairing a bridge to excuse themselves by showing either that they are not bound to repair the whole or any part of the bridge, without showing what other person is bound to repair it, and that in such case the whole charge shall be laid upon the defendants by reason of their ill plea. (s) But it is submitted that, from analogy to the case of highways, this doctrine must be understood only of indictments against the county, and not of indictments against individuals, or bodies corporate, who are not of common right bound to repair; because, as it lies on the prosecutor specially to state the grounds on which such persons are liable, they may negative these parts of the charge under the general issue. (t) And it has been holden, upon an information for not repairing a bridge, that the defendants, if not chargeable of common right, may discharge themselves upon the general issue. (u) But it is clear that the inhabitants of a county, in order to exonerate themselves from the burden of repairing a bridge lying within it, must show by their plea that some other person is liable to repair. (v) It has, however, been recently decided, that it is competent to the inhabitants of a county, upon the general issue, to give evidence of the bridge having been repaired by private individuals. But this evidence appears to have been considered barely admissible as a medium of proof that the bridge was not a public bridge, which undoubtedly the defendants had a right to prove by every species of evidence: and the Court seemed to think that it would have but little effect; though in order to ascertain whether a bridge be public, the mode of its construction, and the manner of its continuance, may be circumstances which, as they are connected with others, may have much or little weight. (w)

To an indictment for not repairing a bridge described as lying in two parishes, it is no plea that there has been a verdict and judgment against J. S. finding him liable to repair it ratione tenuræ, upon a presentment describing it as lying in one of the parishes; for he may be liable to repair only what is in one parish. The information was against the county of Essex for not repairing Dagenham Bridge, in the several parishes of Hornchurch and Dagenham; and the plea was that Knatchbull and Fanshaw had been presented for not repairing it ratione tenuræ of lands in Barking, and that a verdict and judgment had passed against Fanshaw; and to this there was a demurrer, because the presentment stated in the plea described the bridge as in Dagenham parish. And the Court said that Fanshaw might be bound to repair what was in Dagenham parish, and the county might be bound to repair the rest; and gave judgment for the King. (x)

It is said, that where the defendants plead that an individual ought to repair the bridge mentioned in the indictment, and take a traverse to the charge against themselves, the attorney-general, in this special case, may take a traverse upon a traverse, and insist that the defendants are bound to the repairs, and traverse the charge alleged against the individual: and that an issue ought to be taken of such second traverse; and that the attorney-general may afterwards surmise that the defendants are bound to repair it, and that the whole matter shall be tried by an indifferent jury. (y) But where the inhabitants of a county are indicted for not repairing a bridge, and they throw the charge upon another, they ought not to traverse their obligation to repair; as it is a traverse of a matter of law, and might be made the subject of demurrer. (z)

The plea must correspond with the facts.

Where to an indictment against a riding for not repairing a public carriage-bridge, the plea alleged that certain townships had immemorially used to repair the said bridge, it was held that evidence that the townships had enlarged the bridge to a carriage-bridge, which they had before been bound to repair as a foot-bridge, would not support the plea. (a) And, upon the same principle, where it was proved that a particular parish was bound by prescription to repair an old wooden foot-bridge, used by carriages only in times of flood, and that about forty years ago the trustees of a turnpike-road built on the same site a much wider bridge of brick, which had been constantly used ever since by all carriages passing that way; it was held that these facts did not support a plea pleaded by the county that the parish had immemorially repaired, and still ought to repair, the said bridge. (b) Where the county was indicted for not repairing a bridge, and pleaded that one Marsack was liable to repair ratione tenuræ, it was held that this plea was not sustained by evidence that the estate of Marsack was part of a larger estate, which part Marsack purchased of the Lord Cadogan, who had retained the rest in his own hands, and had repaired the bridge as well before as after the purchase. (c)

The 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 18, s. 5, enacts, that all matters concerning the repairing and amending of bridges and the highways thereunto adjoining shall be determined in the county where they lie, and not elsewhere: but it seems that objection may be made to the justices where they are all interested, and that in such case the trial shall be had in the next county. (d) And no inhabitant of a county ought to be a juror for the trial of an issue, upon the question whether or not the county be bound to repair. (e) So that where the matter concerns the whole county, a suggestion may be made of any other county's being next adjacent: (f) and if the bridge lies within the county of a city, and the question is, whether the county of the city, or the county at large, ought to repair, on a suggestion of these facts on the record, the venire will be awarded into the county adjacent to the larger district. Inhabitants of counties to be admitted as witnesses in prosecutions against private persons, &c.

Inhabitants of counties may be witnesses in prosecutions against private persons or corporate bodies for not repairing bridges. The 1 Anne, stat. 1, c. 18, s. 13, reciting that many private persons, or bodies politic or corporate, were of right obliged to repair decayed bridges, and the highways thereunto adjoining, and that the inhabitants of the county, riding, or division, in which such decayed bridges or highways lay, had not been allowed, upon informations or indictments against such persons or bodies for not repairing them, to be legal witnesses; enacts, that in all informations or indictments in the courts of record at Westminster, or at the assizes or quarter sessions, the evidence of the inhabitants of the town, corporation, county, &c., in which such decayed bridge or highway lies shall be taken and admitted. Even before this statute, such evidence had been thought admissible from necessity. (h) Upon an indictment for not repairing a bridge and road, under a liability ratione tenuræ, inhabitants of the parish, in which the bridge and road lie, have been held competent for the prosecution, under the 54 Geo. 3, c. 170, s. 9. (i)

It was said in one case, (k) and decided in another, (l) that evidence of reputation could not be admitted to establish a liability to repair a bridge ratione tenuræ. But it has since been expressly held that such evidence is admissible to prove such a liability; for although the question may involve matter of private right, yet matters of public interest also depend upon it. Where, therefore, to a presentment that a bridge was out of repair the parish pleaded that A. was liable to repair it ratione tenuræ, and issue was joined on A.'s liability, it was held that evidence of reputation that A. ought to repair the bridge as alleged in the plea was admissible. (m)

Upon the trial of an indictment against a township for the non-repair of a bridge, evidence is admissible that the solicitor for the prosecution had interviews with one of the churchwardens and the surveyor of the township, and that they on those occasions admitted that their township had always repaired the bridge, and showed township books containing entries on the subject, although it was not proved that these parties were ratepayers; but they lived together in a house in the township, and there was no other proof that they occupied property there; for every inhabitant, whether actually rated or not, is liable on an indictment against the inhabitants, and is a defendant on the record. He may, though a defendant, be a competent witness by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 46; but it does not follow that the Crown can compel him to give evidence against his interest. At all events he is a defendant on the record, and what a defendant on the record says is evidence against him in every case. (n)

As a prosecution for a nuisance to a public bridge has for its object the removal of the obstruction, or the effecting of the necessary reparations, the judgment of the Court upon a conviction will generally be regulated by the same principles as those which have been mentioned in relation to the judgment for a nuisance to a highway. (o) The 1 Anne, stat. 1, c. 18, s. 4, enacts, that no fine, issue, penalty, or forfeiture, upon presentments or indictments for not repairing bridges, or the highways at the ends of bridges, shall be returned into the Exchequer, but shall be paid to the treasurer, to be applied towards the repairs. But this seems only to relate to county bridges.

Of staying the judgment.

Where upon an indictment for not repairing a bridge the verdict was unsatisfactory, the practice formerly was to grant a rule for staying the judgment upon payment of the costs of the prosecution, in order that another indictment might be tried. (p) But it would seem that the Court would now grant a new trial in such a case. (q)

certiorari.

The 1 Anne, stat. 1, c. 18, s. 5, enacts, that no presentment or indictment for not repairing bridges, or the highways at the ends of bridges, shall be removed by certiorari out of the county into any other Court. But it has been decided that, notwithstanding these general words of the statute, an indictment for not repairing a bridge may be removed by certiorari at the instance of the prosecutor. (r) And it has been resolved that this clause of the Act extends only to bridges where the county is charged to repair; and that where a private person or parish is charged, and the right will come in question, the 5 Will. & M. c. 11, had allowed the granting a certiorari. (s) A certiorari lies to remove an order made by the justices concerning the repair of a bridge, pursuant to a private Act of Parliament; and the justices ought to return the private Act upon which their order is founded. (t)

still be awarded for a frivolous

The 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 64, empowered the Court trying an indictment for nonrepair of a highway to award costs to the prosecutor if the defence was frivolous; and the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 1, enacted that all 'matters and things in the said Act contained relating to highways,' shall, so far as applicable, be extended and applied to county bridges 'as fully and effectually as if the same and every part thereof were herein repeated and reenacted.' And the Court of Queen's Bench held that the clause as to costs in the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, was substantively reenacted in the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, with reference to county bridges, and therefore was not repealed by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, which repeals in general terms the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, and consequently that the costs of an indictment for the nonrepair of a bridge may still be ordered where the defence is frivolous. (u)

after the assizes.

The judge, who tries an indictment for the nonrepair of a bridge, removed by certiorari, may certify after the assizes that the defence was frivolous, and by such certificate award payment of costs to the prosecutor, which will be enforced by the Court of Queen's Bench. (v)

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIRST.

OF OBSTRUCTING PROCESS, AND OF DISOBEDIENCE TO ORDERS OF MAGISTRATES.

SEC. I.

Of Obstructing Process.

THE obstructing the execution of lawful process is an offence against public justice of a very high and presumptuous nature ; and more particularly so when the obstruction is of an arrest upon criminal process. So that it has been holden that the party opposing an arrest upon criminal process becomes thereby particeps criminis : that is, an accessory in felony, and a principal in high treason. (a)

A party opposing an arrest upon criminal process becomes particeps criminis.

And it should seem that the giving assistance to a person suspected of felony and pursued by the officers of justice, in order to enable such person to avoid being arrested, is an offence of the degree of misdemeanor, as being an obstruction to the course of public justice. (b) Thus, an indictment was preferred against the defendant for a misdemeanor in the obstruction of public justice by rendering assistance to one Olive, who was suspected of forgery and pursued by the officers of justice, in order to enable Olive to avoid being arrested. It appeared in evidence that Olive had committed a forgery, as stated in the indictment ; and had afterwards, in a state of desperation, thrown himself from the top of a house, by which he was greatly hurt ; and that the defendant, who was a relation and commiserated his wretched condition, conveyed him secretly on board a barge from Gloucester to Bristol, and was actively employed at the latter place in endeavouring to enable him to escape from this country in a West India vessel. Advertisements had been printed and circulated, stating the charge against Olive, and offering a large reward for his apprehension : but it was not proved that any one of these advertisements had come to the knowledge of the defendant, or that the defendant was acquainted with the particular charge against Olive, or knew that he had been guilty of forgery, as alleged in the indictment. Upon this ground the defendant was acquitted : but no other objection was taken to the indictment. (c)

C. c. 17, s. 1, where Hawkins submits that it is reasonable to understand the books which seem to contradict this opinion to intend no more than that it is not felony in the party himself, who is attacked in order to be arrested, to save himself from the arrest by such resistance.

(b) This position is not warranted by the case; for it states that 'Olive had committed forgery,' and the position ought to be 'a person guilty of felony,' instead of 'suspected of felony.' C. S. G.

(c) Rex v. Buckle, cor. Garrow, B. Gloucester Spring Ass. 1821.

Formerly, one of the greatest obstructions to public justice, both of the civil and criminal kind, was the multitude of pretended privileged places where indigent persons assembled together to shelter themselves from justice (especially in London and Southwark) under the pretence of their having been ancient palaces of the Crown, or the like; (d) and it was found necessary to abolish the supposed privileges and protection of these places by several legislative enactments. The 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 27, 9 Geo. 1, c. 28, and 11 Geo. 1, c. 22, enact that persons opposing the execution of any process in the pretended privileged places therein mentioned, or abusing any officer in his endeavours to execute his duty therein, so that he receives bodily hurt, shall be guilty of felony, and transported (e) for seven years; and persons in disguise, joining in or abetting any riot or tumult on such account, or opposing any process, or assaulting and abusing any officer executing, or for having executed the same, are declared to be felons without benefit of clergy. (f)

In some proceedings, particularly in those relating to the execution of the revenue laws, (g) the Legislature has made especial provision for the punishment of those who obstruct officers and persons acting under proper authority. But in ordinary cases, where the offence committed is less than felony, the obstruction of officers in the apprehension of the party will be only a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. (h)

must be lawful to make a party guilty of an obstruction.

A party will not be guilty of the offence of obstructing an officer, or the process which such officer may be about to execute, unless the arrest is lawful. And in an indictment for this offence it must appear that the arrest was made by proper authority. Thus where an indictment for an assault, false imprisonment, and rescue, stated that the judges of the court of record of the town and county, &c. of P. issued their writ, directed to T. B., one of the serjeants at mace of the said town and county, to arrest W., by virtue of which T. B. was proceeding to arrest W. within the jurisdiction of the said Court, but that the defendant assaulted T. B. in the due execution of his office, and prevented the arrest; the Court held that it was bad, as it did not appear that T. B. was an officer of the Court; a serjeant at mace ex vi termini meaning no more than a person who carries a mace for some one or other. And the Court also held that there could not be judgment, after a general verdict on such a count, as for a common assault and false imprisonment; because the jury must be taken to have found that the assault and imprisonment were for the cause therein stated; and that cause appeared to have been the attempt by the officer to make an illegal arrest. (i) Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'process ought always to be directed to a proper known officer; otherwise, if it may be directed to any stranger, it might be resisted for want of knowledge that the party is an officer of the Court. Then, taking the whole count together, the jury in effect find that there was an assault and imprisonment, but committed under circumstances which justified the defendant. For if a man without authority attempt to arrest another illegally, it is a breach of the peace; and any other person may lawfully interfere to prevent it, doing no more than is necessary for that purpose; (k) and nothing further appears in this case to have been done.' (l)

But where the process is regular, and executed by the proper officer, it will not be competent even for a peace officer to obstruct him, on the ground that the execution of it is attended with an affray and disturbance of the peace; for it is an established principle that if one, having a sufficient authority, issue a lawful command, it is not in the power of any other, having an equal authority in the same respect, to issue a contrary command; as that would be to legalize confusion and disorder. (m) The following case upon an indictment for an assault and rescue proceeded upon this principle. Some sheriff's officers having apprehended a man by virtue of a writ against him, a mob collected, and endeavoured by violence to rescue the prisoner. In the course of the scuffle, which was at ten o'clock at night, one of the bailiffs, having been violently assaulted, struck one of the assailants, a woman, and it was thought for some time that he had killed her; whereupon, and before her recovery was ascertained, the constable was sent for, and charged with the custody of the bailiff who had struck the woman. The bailiffs, on the other hand, gave the constable notice of their authority, and represented the violence which had been previously offered to them; notwithstanding which the constable proceeded to take them into custody upon the charge of murder, and at first offered to take care also of their prisoner; but their prisoner was soon rescued from them by the surrounding mob. The next morning, the woman having recovered, the bailiffs were released by the constable. Upon these facts, Heath, J., was clearly of opinion that the constable and his assistants were guilty of the assault and rescue. (n)

Where the obstruction of process by the rescue of a party arrested is accompanied, as is usually the case, with circumstances of violence and assault upon the officer, the offence may be made the subject of a proceeding by indictment; and, as will be shown more fully in a subsequent Chapter, (o) the rescue, or attempt to rescue a party arrested on a criminal charge is usually punished by that mode of proceeding. And the offence of rescuing a person arrested on mesne process, or in execution after judgment, subjects the offender to a writ of rescous, or a general action of trespass vi et armis, or an action on the case; in all which damages are recoverable. (p) And it has also been the frequent practice of the Courts to grant an attachment against such wrongdoers, it being the highest violence and contempt that can be offered to the process of the Court. Of rescuing goods dis-trained; and of pound-

The forcibly rescuing goods distrained, and the rescuing cattle by the breach of the pound in which they have been placed, have been considered as offences at common law, and made the subject of indictment. (r) In a late case where a defendant was indicted for rescuing goods distrained for church-rate, it seems not to have been doubted that such a rescue was an indictable offence. (s) It has before been stated, that an indictment will lie for taking goods forcibly, if such taking be proved to be a breach of the peace: (t) but, as a mere trespass, without circumstances of violence, is not indictable; (u) it has been doubted whether even a pound-breach, which has been considered as a greater offence at common law than a rescue, (v) is an indictable offence, if unaccompanied by a breach of the peace. (w) But, on the other hand, it has been submitted that, as a pound-breach is an injury and insult to public justice, it is indictable as such at common law. (x)

Where a hayward had distrained a horse damage feasant on an inclosed piece of pasture, and it was rescued from him on the way to the pound, and before it was impounded; it was held that this was not indictable, for till the horse got to the pound the hayward was merely acting as the servant of the owner of the land; but it was said that if the hayward had driven cattle, which he had found straying in the lanes, to the pound, they would have been in the custody of the law from the first, and the rescue of them on the way to the pound would have been indictable. (y)

It has been held in Ireland on an indictment for rescuing property distrained for poor-rate, that it is not necessary to prove the making of the rate, or that there is any sum due at the time of making the distress; but the warrant to collect, if in the form and with the requisites required by the Poor-law Act, will be sufficient primâ facie evidence of the authority of the collector; and that the section which requires the sum to be collected to be specified in the warrant is satisfied by a reference in the warrant to the collector's book delivered at the time to the collector, and by such reference the book becomes incorporated with the warrant. (z) But where on a similar indictment the warrant was in the same form as in the preceding case, but the occupiers were only described as 'tenants of commons' in the collector's book, it was held that the collector had no authority to distrain on the actual occupier, as the description in the book was insufficient. (a)

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 30, provides for the summary conviction of any person who releases any cattle distrained on any inclosed land. (b)

The civil remedy, however, given by the 2 Will. & M. c. 5, s. 4, will, in most cases of a pound-breach, or a rescue of goods distrained for rent, be found the most desirable mode of proceeding, where the offenders are responsible persons. That statute enacts that, upon pound-breach, or rescous of goods distrained for rent, the person grieved shall, in a special action on the case, recover treble damages and costs against the offenders, or against the owner of the goods, if they come to his use. (c)

It is laid down in the books that, if a rescue be made upon a distress, &c., for the King, an indictment lies against the rescuer. (d) And we have seen that a lessee, resisting with force a distress for rent, or forestalling or rescuing the distress, will be guilty of the offence of a forcible detainer. (e)

SEC. II.

Of Disobedience to Orders of Magistrates.

DISOBEDIENCE to an order of the justices of the peace at their sessions, made by them in the due exercise of the powers of their jurisdiction, is an indictable offence. Thus, a party has been holden to be guilty of an indictable offence, in disobeying an order of sessions for the maintenance of his grandchildren. (f) In this case it was moved in arrest of judgment that, as the 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 7, had annexed a specific penalty, and a particular mode of proceeding, the course prescribed by the Act ought to have been adopted, and that there could be no proceeding by indictment: but, after able argument, and great deliberation, the Court were of opinion that the prosecutor was at liberty to proceed at common law, or in the method prescribed by the statute; and that there could be no doubt but that an indictment would lie at common law for disobedience to an order of sessions. (g)

Upon the same principle it was holden that, where an Act of Parliament gave power to the King in council to make a certain order, and did not annex any specific punishment to the disobeying it, such disobedience was an indictable offence, punishable as a misdemeanor at common law. (h)

Disobedience to an order of sessions.

Disobedience to an order of council.

Disobedience to an order of justices.

Disobeying an order of one or more justices, when duly made, is also a common law offence, and therefore punishable by indictment. (i) Thus, it has been holden to be an indictable offence to disobey an order of justices directing a highway to be widened, under the 13 Geo. 3. c. 78. (k) And it seems that an indictment will lie for disobedience to an order of justices placing out an apprentice pursuant to the statute, when such disobedience is either by not receiving, turning off, or not providing for such apprentice. (l) So a power to remove a pauper being given to two justices by the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 12, the not receiving him is a disobedience of that statute for which an indictment will lie. (m) And, by Foster, J., 'In all cases where a justice has power given him to make an order, and direct it to an inferior ministerial officer, and he disobeys it, if there be no particular remedy prescribed, it is indictable.' (n)

order of justices is a mere nullity another may be made and will support an indictment for disobeying it.

Where an order of justices is a perfect nullity on the face of it, another order may be made, and an indictment will lie for disobeying it. Two justices made an order against the defendant as the putative father of a bastard child, and this order was served upon the defendant; but no payment was made by him under it. The justices, who made this order, having discovered that it was wholly void for not stating that the proof was in the presence and hearing of the defendant, issued a supersedeas of the order, which was served on the defendant, and a tender made to, but declined by, him of the costs actually incurred by him in consequence of the first order. A regular order was subsequently made, and served on the defendant; and it was held, that as the first order was clearly void, it had no operation at all, and therefore the case must be treated as if it had not been heard at all, and consequently the second order was valid. (o)

Order by an

A magistrate residing within a poor-law union, is only a guardian ex officio, under the Poor Law Amendment Act, while he is acting as such guardian. Where, therefore, two magistrates made an order of filiation under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 85, upon the complaint of the guardians of the Teesdale Union, and both the magistrates resided within the Teesdale Union, and were, therefore, guardians ex officio of it, and one of them was a rated inhabitant of a township within the Teesdale Union, but not that township in favour of which the order was made; and he had on other occasions acted as a guardian ex officio, but neither

(o) Reg. v. Brishy, 1 Den. C. C. 416; 2 C. & K. 962. The judges seemed to think that as the first order was a nullity, it could not be superseded, which was in the nature of a writ of error. In Reg. v. Marchant, 1 Cox C. C. 203, which was an indictment for disobeying a bastardy order, the only points decided were as to the sufficiency of a notice by a board of guardians to the putative father, and as to the order showing that the evidence was taken on oath. In Reg. v. Ferrall, 2 Den. C. C. 51, the question was whether, under a clause in the Annual Mutiny Act, a soldier was freed from an indictment for disobeying a bastardy order; and the Court held that he was not, as it was a 'criminal matter;' but the recent Mutiny Acts are in different terms, which seem to have been adopted in order to prevent a soldier from being so indicted, though they are very ill selected for the purpose. See Reg. v. Stamper, 1 Q. B. 119, as to the jurisdiction of the sessions to award costs in an application for a bastardy order under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 73.

had acted as guardian in anything respecting this matter; it was held that the order was good. (p)

Where such an order is made, any person mentioned in it, and required to act under it, must, upon its being duly served upon him, lend his aid to carry it into effect. Thus where, upon a complaint made by an excluded member of a friendly society, two persons, A. and B., the then stewards of the society, were summoned, and an order made by two justices that such stewards and the other members of the society should forthwith reinstate the complainant; it was holden, that though this order was not served upon A. and B. until they had ceased to be stewards, yet it was still obligatory upon them, as members of the society, to attempt to reinstate the complainant; and that their having ceased to be stewards was no justification of entire neglect on their part. (q) Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said at the trial. 'The order is not confined to the stewards alone, but is made upon all the members of the society; and the defendants were members of the society independently of their being stewards, and were bound, as members, to see that the order was obeyed: or, at least, to have taken some steps for that purpose. As members, they might have done something; as stewards, indeed, they might, with greater facility, have enforced obedience to the order; but each member had it in his power to lend some aid for the attainment of that object.' And when in the ensuing term a motion was made that a verdict might be entered for the defendants, on the ground that, having ceased to be stewards when the notice was served, they had not been guilty of a criminal default; the Court said, that if the defendants had shown that they did everything in their power to restore the party, in obedience to the order, they might have given it in evidence by way of excuse. (r)

So an indictment lies against the president and stewards of a friendly society for disobeying an order of justices requiring them and the members of the said society to readmit a member, though it be sworn that the power of doing so is not in the president and stewards, but in a committee. (s)

There must be personal service of an order on all persons who are charged with a contempt of it: and it was held, upon demurrer, to be a decisive objection to an indictment for a disobedience and contempt of an order of sessions, that it charged a contempt by six persons of an order, which was only stated to have been served on four of them. (t)

The entire order of a Court to pay the expenses of a prosecution, under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 26, must be served on the treasurer of the county. Where, therefore, an order was made to pay an aggregate sum, the details of which were annexed, and the

The order should be personally served.

(p) Reg. v. Cant, 2 M. C. C. 271; C. & Mars, 521.

(q) Rex v. Gash, 1 Starkie, 41.

(r) Id. ibid. The motion was also made on another ground; namely, a defect in the jurisdiction of the magistrates: two magistrates of the county of Middlesex, where the meetings of the society were held, having made the order, though the society had been originally established in London, and its rules enrolled at the sessions for London. But the Court decided that the magistrates of Middlesex had jurisdiction. See 33 Geo. 3, c. 54, and 49 Geo. 3, c. 125, s. 1.

attorney tore off the details, and served the order for the payment of the aggregate sum alone on the treasurer; it was held, on a case reserved, that he was not indictable for refusing to obey the order. (u)

Upon an indictment for disobeying an order commanding the stewards of a friendly society to readmit A. B., it seems to be sufficient to prove that the order was served on one of the defendants, and that the others when A. B. applied to them to be readmitted said they would not, and did not care for the justices' order. (v)

It appears to have been holden not to be necessary, in an indictment against a public officer for disobedience of orders, to aver that the orders have not been revoked; for the orders, being stated to have been given by those who were empowered by certain statutes to give them, must be taken to remain in force until they were revoked or contradicted. (w) But an indictment for disobeying an order of justices must show explicitly that an order was made; and it is not sufficient to state the order by way of recital. (x) It is said to be more safe to aver that the defendant was requested to comply with the terms of the order. (y) But if the statement of the order having been served on all the defendants (which, as has been before observed, is a necessary statement) be omitted, the want of such an allegation will not be supplied by averring that they were all requested to perform the duties required by the order. (z)

Indictment for disobeying an order to pay church-rate.

Where an indictment for refusing to obey an order of justices to pay a church-rate, alleged that the rate 'was duly made as by law in that behalf required, and that the same was afterwards duly allowed as by law in that behalf required,' and that 'the defendant was duly rated' in and by the said rate at the sum of sixteen shillings; it was objected that the facts ought to have been stated which constituted a due making and allowance of the rate and a due rating of the defendant; but it was held, first, that these introductory facts were alleged only to show that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order, and therefore they fell within the description of inducement, in which such a general allegation was allowed. Secondly, that the rest of the count showed that the justices had sufficient authority to make the order, as there was a sufficient information by competent persons to give them jurisdiction. (a) The same indictment stated that a church-rate had been (z) Rex v. Kingston, 8 East, 41, 53.

(a) Reg. v. Bidwell, 1 Den. C. C. 222. The case was decided by Parke, B., alone. The information was on the oath of the churchwardens, and alleged that the rate was 'duly made' and was 'duly allowed,' that the defendant was at the time of the making and allowance thereof an inhabitant and occupier of a dwelling-house in the parish, and was 'duly rated' by the said rate, &c. And Parke, B., held that this information was sufficient to give the justices jurisdiction, though open to the objection of informality in making a mixed allegation of fact and law, instead of stating facts only, and the learned Baron also held that the magistrates duly demanded of the defendant, and that he had refused and neglected to pay the rate to W. A. and J. C., who then were the churchwardens; and it was held that, though it did not state that they were churchwardens when the rate was demanded, it was sufficient that they were shown to be so when the rate was neglected and refused to be paid; for that was the offence. (b) The same indictment alleged that a justice made his warrant (summons), whereby, 'after reciting as therein recited,' he summoned the defendant, and the indictment did not state to whom the warrant was directed; and it was held that it was sufficient, for enough of the warrant was stated without mentioning the recital, and it was sufficiently averred that it was directed to the defendant. (b) The same indictment averred that a summons was issued on the 30th of May to appear on the 6th of June then next, and was 'before the said 6th day of June, to wit, on the 30th of May' personally served on the defendant, who did not appear in pursuance of it; and it was held that it must be assumed that the justices satisfied themselves that it had been served a reasonable time before the day of appearance, otherwise they would have acted unjustly in making the order in the absence of the defendant, and the intendment is always favourable to the validity of an order. (c) On the same indictment it was also held that it is not necessary to set out the order according to the tenor; it is enough to set out the substance of it correctly. (d) The same indictment did not aver the church-rate to have been in force when the order to pay it was made, but it was held that, as it averred that the rate continued in force at the time of the indictment, it was quite sufficient. (e) It was also held that such an indictment need not allege the date of the order, (f) as that was immaterial.

An indictment alleged that an appeal was made by the defendants against a rate to the sessions, who dismissed the appeal, and ordered the defendants 'immediately upon service of the said order, or a true copy thereof,' to pay the churchwardens and overseers a sum for costs of the appeal, and that a true copy of the said order was afterwards personally served upon each of the defendants, and each of them had notice of the said order. Nevertheless, the defendants wilfully neglected and refused to pay. Upon the trial the Clerk of the Peace produced the minutes of the sessions, and read the order, which ordered the defendants 'immediately upon service of this order, or a true copy thereof,' to pay the costs. The Clerk of the Peace stated that 'the costs were not taxed during the actual sitting of the sessions, but between the time of the Court adjourning and its meeting. I reported to the magistrates what I thought fit and proper costs; and the Court adopted it. I made a verbal statement, which the Court adopted. I gave both parties an opportunity of attending. The defendants did not attend. I wrote a letter to their solicitor. The appeal was dismissed for want of due notice.' The defendants' attorney was the person attending the appeal, and was present when the order was made. There were four or five of the magistrates at the adjournment who were at the original sessions. A witness proved that he served each defendant with a paper, which he told them was a true copy of the order, as in fact it was, and at the time of service read to each the contents of a parchment writing, which was also a true copy of the order, and was produced on the trial. It was objected, first, that as notice to produce the copies served had not been given, evidence could not be given that the copy served was a true copy; but it was held that a notice to produce the paper served would have been notice to produce a notice, which is never required; secondly, that an order to pay 'upon service of the said order, or a true copy thereof,' was bad on the face of it; but it was held to be perfectly sufficient—that an order of sessions in that form was good. And the service was also good, whether the book of the sessions or the parchment was the order; for if the book was the original, it could not be shown at the time of the service, and if the parchment was the original, its contents were read over. (g) And, lastly, that the adjourned sessions had no jurisdiction to fix the amount of costs; but the Court held that it was unnecessary to decide that point. The magistrates must be taken to have ordered in the first instance, in the presence of all the parties, that the defendants should pay such costs as the officer might find to be due; and the result of the evidence being that both parties had an opportunity of attending the taxation, and no objection being made when the amount was stated in Court, a state of things took place which amounted to a consent, and therefore the order was valid. (h)

Proof of justices' order to restore possession to a landlord.

The 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 16, enables two justices to put a landlord in possession of premises in any case where one year's rent is in arrear, and the tenant deserts the premises and leaves them uncultivated or unoccupied so as no sufficient distress can be had; and sec. 17 empowers the next justice or justices of assize, on the appeal of the tenant, to award restitution to the tenant. Upon an indictment for disobeying the order of the justices of assize to restore possession to the tenant, it seems sufficient to put in the record made up by the justices of the peace, in which, after reciting the complaint and other proceedings, they declare that they put the landlord in possession, and it seems unnecessary to prove the complaint of the landlord. (i)

Record of an appeal against stopping up a highway.

Upon the trial of an indictment for not paying a sum of money pursuant to an order of sessions made on an appeal by the defendant against a certificate of two justices, for stopping up, diverting, and turning a part of a public footway, the record of the order of sessions, together with proof of the service of a copy of the order

(h) Reg. v. Mortlock, 7 Q. B. 459.

(i) Reg. v. Sewell, 8 Q. B. 161. The very ground of the appeal might be that the justices of the peace had acted without any complaint, and therefore the proof of the complaint could not be necessary. The Court held in this case that the order of the justices of assize must be made by them as individual justices, and not as a Court, and therefore a certificate of such an order, signed by the deputy clerk of assize in the same way as an order of Court, is not sufficient. It seems also that the order should be signed by the justices of assize, and that they alone, and none of the other commissioners, have jurisdiction to make such an order.

upon the defendant, and a demand of the sum ordered thereby to be paid, to which the defendant only answered that he did not owe anything, is sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and it is not necessary to prove aliunde the existence of the certificate or the fact of the appeal. An order of sessions made upon such an appeal need not show the time at which the certificate of the justices was lodged with the clerk of the peace; for the sessions have no duty to inquire into that fact, unless the objection is raised before them. (h)

On the trial of an indictment against the stewards of a friendly society for disobeying an order of justices, which recited that the rules of such society had been enrolled, such recital is not evidence of that fact, and it must be proved by other means, in order to show that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order under the 33 Geo. 3, c. 54, s. 2. (l) Upon the trial of such an indictment, the Court will not enter into the merits of the original case, nor will they hear objections to the order which do not appear upon the face of it. (m) Upon the trial, therefore, of such an indictment it is no defence that the party ordered to be readmitted was ineligible to be a member of the society, as that was matter of defence before the justices. (n) So on a motion to arrest the judgment upon an indictment for disobeying an order of justices for the payment of a fine upon a conviction, the Court of King's Bench refused to hear any objections to the conviction which did not appear upon the face of it. (o) But if it appear on the face of the order that the justices had no jurisdiction to make it, the defendant should be acquitted, without being left to bring a writ of error, though the want of jurisdiction be apparent on the face of the indictment. Where, therefore, certain justices, acting under the Building Act (14 Geo. 3, c. 78) had made an order that a building should be removed, as an encroachment on a highway, but the building was not stated in the order to extend beyond the general line of the houses so as to be contrary to the provisions of the Act; it was held, upon an indictment for disobeying such order, that the defendant should be acquitted, although the objection appeared upon the record. (p)

Where an indictment stated that M. had been expelled from a friendly society, and had been deprived of certain relief from it, to which he was entitled, and that, finding himself aggrieved thereby, he made complaint thereof to two justices, and deposed before them to the truth of the said complaint, and that the justices ordered that he should be continued a member of the society, and that the stewards of the society unlawfully refused so to continue him as a member of the society, and the order when produced, recited only a complaint that the stewards had refused to pay him the relief, but contained an order to pay the relief, and also that he should be continued a member of the society; it was held that the defendants were entitled to be acquitted;

Legality of the order cannot be inquired into on the trial or on motion in arrest of judgment.

But want of jurisdiction may.

first, because the allegations of the indictment were not proved, as the defendants were only summoned to answer one ground of complaint, and not two; and, secondly, because the adjudication to continue M. as a member of the society was bad, for the 33 Geo. 3, c. 54, s. 15, confines the jurisdiction of justices to the subject matter of the complaint. CHAPTER THE THIRTY SECOND.

OF ESCAPES.

AN escape is where one who is arrested gains his liberty before he is delivered by the course of the law. (a) And it may be by the party himself; either without force before he is put in hold, or with force after he is restrained of his liberty; or it may be by others; and this also either without force, by their permission or negligence, or with force, by the rescuing of the party from custody. Where the liberation of the party is effected either by himself or others, without force, it is more properly called an escape; where it is effected by the party himself with force, it is called prison-breaking; and where it is effected by others, with force, it is commonly called a rescue. (b) In the present chapter it is proposed to consider those acts without force, which more properly come under the title of escape. [416]

There is little worthy of remark in the books respecting an escape effected by the party himself, without force: but the general principle appears to be, that, as all persons are bound to submit themselves to the judgment of the law, and to be ready to be justified by it, those who, declining to undergo a legal imprisonment when arrested on criminal process, free themselves from it by any artifice, and elude the vigilance of their keepers, before they are put in hold, are guilty of an offence in the nature of a high contempt, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. (c) And it is also criminal in a prisoner to escape from lawful confinement, though no force or artifice be used on his part to effect such purpose. Thus, if a prisoner go out of his prison without any obstruction, the doors being opened by the consent or negligence of the gaoler, or if he escape in any other manner, without using any kind of force or violence, he will be guilty of a misdemeanor; and if his prison be broken by others, without his procurement or consent, and he escape through the breach so made, he may be indicted for the escape. (d) Of an escape by the party himself.

Upon an indictment for an escape from the house of correction, after conviction for a capital offence and conditional pardon, it was held that a certificate of the former conviction by the clerk of assize was not evidence, there being no Act which made it evidence. (e) Evidence. But the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 44, to the intent that [417] prosecutions for escapes, breaches of prison, and rescues, may be carried on with as little trouble and expense as possible, enacts (amongst other things), that in case of any prosecution for any escape, attempt to escape, breach of prison or rescue, either against the offender escaping or attempting to escape, or having broken prison, or having been rescued, or against any other person or persons concerned therein, or aiding, abetting, or assisting the same, a certificate given by the clerk of assize, or other clerk of the court in which such offender shall have been convicted, shall, together with due proof of the identity of the person, be sufficient evidence to the Court and jury of the nature and fact of the conviction, and of the species and period of confinement to which such person was sentenced. (f) It was decided upon the 56 Geo. 3, c. 27, s. 8 [now repealed], that the certificate of a former conviction, authorized by that statute, should set forth the effect and substance of the conviction; and that stating it to have been for felony only was insufficient. The prisoner was indicted for being at large after a sentence of transportation for seven years: the indictment only stated that he had been convicted of felony, without specifying the nature of that felony; and the certificate to prove the former conviction was in the same form; and the judges thought this case decided by a former case of Rex v. Sutcliffe, and that both the indictment and certificate were insufficient. (g)

Persons escaping out of England.

The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, ss. 12, 13, 14 and 15, provides for the apprehension of persons charged with indictable offences, who escape into Ireland, the Isles of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, and Scotland, and for the dealing with such persons after their apprehension; and the Act also provides for the apprehension of persons so charged who escape from these territories into England.

Escapes effected, or, perhaps, more properly, suffered by others than the party himself, without force, by permission or negligence, may be either—I. By officers; or, II. By private persons.

SEC. I.

Of Escapes suffered by Officers.

[418]

The escape must be after an actual arrest.

AN escape of this kind must be from a justifiable imprisonment for a criminal matter, after an actual arrest.

As there must be an actual arrest, it has been holden, that if an officer, having a warrant to arrest a man, see him shut up in a house, and challenge him as his prisoner, but never actually have him in his custody, and the party get free, the officer cannot be charged with an escape. (h)

(f) See the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 13, post, Evidence.

(g) Rex v. Watson, Mich. T. 1821. MS. Bayley, J., and R. & R. 468. The prisoner was remitted to his original sentence. The 56 Geo. 3, c. 27, s. 3, authorized a certificate containing the effect and substance only, omitting the formal part, of every indictment, conviction, &c.

(h) 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19, s. 1.

The arrest and imprisonment must be justifiable; for, if a party be arrested for a supposed crime, when no such crime was committed, and the party neither indicted nor appealed, or for such a slight suspicion of an actual crime and by such an irregular mittimus as will neither justify the arrest nor imprisonment, the officer is not guilty of an escape by suffering the prisoner to go at large. (i) But it seems that if a warrant of commitment plainly and expressly charge the party with treason or felony, though it be not strictly formal, the gaoler, suffering an escape, is punishable; and that where commitments are good in substance, the gaoler is as much bound to observe them as if they were made ever so exactly. (k) It is stated as a good general rule upon this subject that, whenever an imprisonment is so far irregular that it will be no offence in the prisoner to break from it by force, it can be no offence in the officer to suffer him to escape. (l)

And the arrest and imprisonment must be justifiable.

The imprisonment must not only be justifiable, but also for some criminal matter. But the escape of one committed for petit larceny (m) only was criminal; and it seems most agreeable to the general reason of the law that the escape of a person committed for any other crime whatsoever should also be criminal. (n) The imprisonment must also be continuing at the time of the escape; and its continuance must be grounded on that satisfaction which the public justice demands for the crime committed. So that if a prisoner be acquitted, and detained only for his fees, it will not be criminal to suffer him to escape, though the judgment were that he should be discharged, 'paying his fees;' he being in such case detained only as a debtor: but if a person, convicted of a crime, be condemned to imprisonment for a certain time, and also 'until he pays his fees,' it is said, that perhaps an escape of such person, after the time of his imprisonment is elapsed, without paying his fees, may be criminal; as it was part of the punishment that the imprisonment should be continued till the fees should be paid. (o)

The imprisonment must be for a criminal matter, and continuing at the time of the escape.

The next important inquiry upon this subject will be, whether the escape be voluntary or negligent, as the former is a much more serious offence than the latter.

Escapes may be voluntary or negligent. Of voluntary escapes.

Whenever an officer, having the custody of a prisoner charged with, and guilty of, a capital offence, knowingly gives him his liberty with an intent to save him either from his trial or execution, such officer is guilty of a voluntary escape; and thereby involved in the guilt of the same crime of which the prisoner is guilty, and for which he was in custody. (p) Hawkins says, that it seems to be the opinion of Sir M. Hale, (q) that in some cases an officer may be adjudged guilty of a voluntary escape who had

(o) 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19, s. 4. This seems to be a good reason; but Hawkins says that it is to be intended only where the fees are due to others as well as to the gaoler; for, otherwise, the gaoler would be the only sufferer by the escape; and that it would be hard to punish him for suffering an injury to himself only in the nonpayment of a debt in his power to release.

no such intent to save the prisoner, but meant only to give him a liberty which, by law, he had no colour of right to give; as if a gaoler should bail a prisoner who is not bailable: but he withholds his assent to that opinion, on the grounds that it is not sufficiently supported by authorities, and does not seem to accord with the purview of the 5 Edw. 3, c. 8, relating to the improper bailing of persons by the marshals of the King's Bench. (r) He says also, that it seems to be agreed that a person who has power to bail is guilty only of a negligent escape, by bailing one who is not bailable; and that there are some cases wherein an officer seems to have been found to have knowingly given his prisoner more liberty than he ought to have had (as by allowing him to go out of prison on a promise to return; or to go amongst his friends, to find some who would warrant goods to be his own which he is suspected to have stolen), and yet seems to have been only adjudged guilty of a negligent escape. (s) And he concludes by saying, that if, in these cases, the officer were only guilty of a negligent escape, in suffering the prisoner to go out of the limits of the prison, without any security for his return, he could not have been guilty in a higher degree if he had taken bail for his return; and that from thence it seems reasonable to infer that it cannot be, in all cases, a general rule that an officer is guilty of a voluntary escape by bailing his prisoner, whom he has no power to bail, but that the judgment to be made of all offences of this kind must depend upon the circumstances of the case; such as the heinousness of the crime with which the prisoner is charged, the notoriety of his guilt, the improbability of his returning to render himself to justice, the intention of the officer, and the motives on which he acted. (t)

It appears to have been holden, that it is an escape in a constable to discharge a person committed to his custody by a watchman as a loose and disorderly woman, and a street-walker, although no positive charge was made. (u)

Of negligent escapes.

A negligent escape is where the party arrested or imprisoned escapes against the will of him that arrests or imprisons him, and is not freshly pursued and taken again before he has been lost sight of. (v) And, from the instances of this offence mentioned in the books, it seems that where a party so escapes the law will presume negligence in the officer. Thus, if a person in custody on a charge of larceny, suddenly and without the assent of the constable, kill, hang, or drown himself, this is considered as a negligent escape in the constable. (w) And if a prisoner charged with felony break a gaol, it is said that this seems to be a negligent escape; because there wanted either the due strength in the gaol that should have secured him, or the due vigilance in the gaoler or his officers that should have prevented it. (x) But it is sub-

(r) Post, p. 589.

(s) Hawkins says, however, that it must be confessed that, in these cases, the prisoner was only accused of larceny, and that it does not appear whether he were bailable or not; and that, generally, the old cases concerning this subject are so very briefly reported that it is very difficult to make an exact state of the matter from them.

mitted that it would be competent to a person charged with a negligent escape under such circumstances to show in his defence that all due vigilance was used, and that the gaol was so constructed as to have been considered by persons of competent judgment a place of perfect security. Undoubtedly an escape happening from defects in these particulars would come within the principle of guilty negligence in those concerned in the proper custody of the criminal; and neglect in not keeping gaols in a proper state of repair, by those who are liable to the burthen of repairing them, appears in many instances to have been treated as an indictable offence, tending to the great hindrance and obstruction of justice. (y)

A person who has power to bail is guilty only of a negligent escape by bailing one who is not bailable. Thus if a justice of peace bails a person not bailable by law, it excuses the gaoler, and is not felony in the justice; but a negligent escape, for which he is finable at common law, and by the justices of gaol delivery. (z) It is laid down as clear law, that whoever de facto occupies the office of gaoler is liable to answer for a negligent escape, and that it is in no way material whether or not his title to the office be legal. (a) But it seems that an indictment for a negligent escape will only lie against those officers upon whom the law casts the obligation of safe custody, and will not lie against the mere servants of such officer. Thus, where the indictment was against one of the yeomen wardens of the Tower and the gentleman gaoler, for permitting Colonel Parker, who was committed for high treason, to escape, it appeared that the constable of the Tower had committed the colonel to their special care: but the Court held that the defendants were not such officers as the law took notice of, and therefore could not be guilty of a negligent escape. (b) And upon the same principle another wardour of the Tower appears also to have been acquitted of a negligent escape. (c) It appears, however, that a sheriff is as much liable to answer for an escape suffered by his bailiff as if he had actually suffered it himself; that the Court may charge either the sheriff or bailiff for such an escape; and that, if a deputy gaoler be not sufficient

Negligent escape by admitting to bail.

‘therefore it is lawful for the gaoler to hamper them with irons, to prevent their escape.’ But see the note (a) ibid., where it is said that this liberty can only be intended where the officer has just reason to fear an escape, as where the prisoner is unruly, or makes any attempt for that purpose; but that otherwise, notwithstanding the common practice of gaolers, it seems altogether unwarrantable, and contrary to the mildness and humanity of the laws of England, by which gaolers are forbid to put their prisoners to any pain or torment. And the Mirror of Justices, ch. 5, s. 1, n. 54, says that it is an abuse that prisoners should be charged with irons, or put to any pain, before they be attainted of felony: and Lord Coke in his comment on the statute of Westm. 2, c. 11, is express, that by the common law it might not be done. 2 Inst. 381.

to answer for a negligent escape, his principal must answer for him. (d)

Of retaking a prisoner.

The difference between a voluntary and negligent escape will also require to be attended to in considering the effect of the retaking of a prisoner after he has been suffered to escape.

After a voluntary escape.

When an officer has voluntarily suffered a prisoner to escape, it is said that he can no more justify the retaking him than if he had never had him in custody before; because, by his own free consent, he hath admitted that he hath nothing to do with him: but if the party return, and put himself again under the custody of the officer, it seems that it may probably be argued that the officer may lawfully detain him, and bring him before a justice in pursuance of the warrant. (e)

After a negligent escape.

It seems to be clearly agreed by all the books, that an officer making fresh pursuit after a prisoner, who has escaped through his negligence, may retake him at any time afterwards, whether he find him in the same or a different county: and it is said generally in some books, that an officer, who has negligently suffered a prisoner to escape, may retake him, wherever he finds him, without mentioning any fresh pursuit; and, indeed, since the liberty gained by the prisoner is wholly owing to his own wrong, there seems to be no reason why he should have any manner of advantage from it. (f) If the officer pursue a prisoner, who flies from him, so closely as to retake him without losing sight of him, the law regards the prisoner as being so much in his power all the time as not to adjudge such flight to amount to an escape: but if the officer once lose sight of the prisoner, it seems to be the better opinion that he will be guilty of a negligent escape, though he should retake him immediately afterwards. (g) And if he has been fined for the offence it is clear that he will not avoid the judgment of his fine by retaking the prisoner. (h) And it is also clear that he cannot excuse himself by killing a prisoner in the pursuit, though he could not possibly retake him; but must, in such case, be content to submit to such fine as his negligence shall appear to deserve. (i)

Proceedings by presentment or indictment, or by a more summary course.

The proceedings against persons charged with having suffered escapes must in general be by presentment or indictment, or they may be by information. (k)

But where persons present in a Court of record are committed to prison by such Court, the keeper of the gaol, as he is bound to have them always ready to produce when called for, if he fail to produce them, will be adjudged guilty of an escape, without further inquiry; unless he have some reasonable matter to allege in his excuse; as that the prison was set on fire, or broken open by enemies, &c., for he will be concluded by the record of the commitment from denying that the prisoners were in his custody. (l) And some have holden, (m) that if a gaoler say nothing in excuse of such an escape, it shall be adjudged voluntary: but it seems difficult to maintain that where it stands indifferent whether an escape be negligent or voluntary, it ought to be adjudged a crime of so high a nature, without a previous trial. (n) With respect to other prisoners not committed in such manner, but in the custody of a gaoler or other person by any other means whatsoever, it seems to be agreed that the person who had them in custody is in no case punishable for an escape, until it be presented. (o) But it is laid down as a rule, that though, where an escape is fineable, the presentment of it is traversable; yet that where the offence is amerciable only, there the presentment is of itself conclusive; such amerciements being reckoned amongst those minima de quibus non curat lex: (p) and this distinction is said to be well warranted by the old books. (q)

It is laid down in the books, that a person who has suffered another to escape cannot be arraigned for such escape as for felony, until the principal be attainted; on the ground that he is only punishable in this degree as an accessory to the felony, and that the general rule is, that no accessory ought to be tried until the principal be attainted; (r) but that he may be indicted and tried for a misprision before any attainder of the principal offender; for, whether such offender were guilty or innocent, it was a high contempt to suffer him to escape. If, however, the commitment were for high treason, and the person committed actually guilty of it, it is said that the escape is immediately punishable as high treason also, whether the party escaping be ever convicted of such crime or not; and the reason given is, that there are no accessories in high treason. (s)

Every indictment for an escape, whether negligent or voluntary, must expressly show that the party was actually in the defendant's custody for some crime, or upon some commitment upon suspicion; (t) and judgment was arrested upon an indictment which stated that the prisoner was in the defendant's custody, and charged with a certain crime, but did not state that he was committed for that crime; for a person in custody may be charged with a crime, and yet not be in custody by reason of such charge. But as all accessories may now be tried before their principals (ante, pp. 67, 69), this reason fails, and there seems no doubt that a person who has suffered a felon to escape is an accessory after the fact, Rex v. Burridge, 3 P. Wms. 439, post, p. 607, and therefore a person who suffers or aids the escape of a felon may be tried for a sub-

But where a person was committed to the custody of a constable by a watchman, as a loose and disorderly woman and a street-walker, it was holden, upon an indictment against the constable for discharging her, that by an allegation of his being charged with her, 'so being such loose,' &c. it was sufficiently averred that he was charged with her 'as such loose,' &c.; and it was also holden not to be necessary to aver that the defendant knew the woman to be a street-walker. (v) And every indictment should also show that the prisoner went at large: (w) and also the time when the offence was committed for which the party was in custody; not only that it may appear that it was prior to the escape, but also that it was subsequent to the last general pardon. (x) If the indictment be for a voluntary escape, it must allege that the defendant feloniously and voluntarily permitted the prisoner to go at large; (y) and must also show the species of crime for which the party was imprisoned; for it will not be sufficient to say, in general, that he was in custody for felony, &c. (z) But it is questionable whether such certainty, as to the nature of the crime, be necessary in an indictment for a negligent escape; as it is not in such case material whether the person who escaped were guilty or not. (a)

By the statute of Westminster, 3 Edw. 1, c. 3, the proceedings and trial for the offence of an escape were to be had before the justices in eyre: but it was adjudged that the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench was not restrained by that statute, that Court being itself the highest Court of eyre. (b) The 31 Edw. 3, c. 14, enacts, that the escape of thieves and felons, and the chattels of felons, &c., from thenceforth to be judged before any of the King's justices, shall be levied from time to time, &c., by which it seems to be implied that other justices, as well as those in eyre, may take cognizance of escapes: and it is certain that justices of gaol delivery may punish justices of peace for a negligent escape, in admitting persons to bail who are not bailable. (c)

Evidence.

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 44, as to the evidence by the certificate of the clerk of assize, or clerk of the Court in which the offender was convicted, has been already mentioned. (d)

Punishment.

In considering the punishment for this offence, it will be necessary again to attend to the distinction between a voluntary and negligent escape.

In cases of voluntary escape.

It seems to be generally agreed that a voluntary escape amounts to the same kind of crime as the offence of which the party was guilty, and for which he was in custody; whether the person escaping were actually committed to some gaol, or under an arrest only, and not committed; and whether he were attainted, or only accused of such crime, and neither indicted nor appealed. (e) But the voluntary escape of a felon was within the benefit of clergy, though the felony for which the party was in custody were ousted. (f) An escape suffered by one who wrongfully takes upon him the keeping of a gaol seems to be punishable in the same manner as if he were rightfully entitled to the custody; for the crime is in both cases of the same ill consequence to the public. (g) But no one is punishable in this degree for a voluntary escape but the person who is actually guilty of it: therefore, the principal gaoler is only fineable for a voluntary escape suffered by his deputy. (h) One voluntary escape is said to amount to a forfeiture of a gaoler's office. (i)

No escape will amount to a capital offence unless the cause for which the party was committed were actually such at the time of the escape: its becoming a capital offence afterwards, as by the death of a party wounded at the time of the escape, but not then dead, will not be sufficient. (k)

Whenever a person is found guilty upon an indictment or presentment of a negligent escape of a criminal actually in his custody, he ought to be condemned in a certain sum, to be paid to the King as a fine. (l) And it seems that, by the common law, the penalty for suffering the negligent escape of a person attainted was of course a hundred pounds, and for suffering such escape of a person indicted, and not attainted, five pounds: and that if the person escaping were neither attainted nor indicted, it was left to the discretion of the Court to assess such a reasonable forfeiture as should seem proper. And it seems also, that if the party had escaped twice, these penalties were of course to be doubled: but that the forfeiture was no greater for suffering a prisoner to escape who had been committed on two several accusations, than if he had been committed but on one. (m) It is the better opinion that one negligent escape will not amount to a forfeiture of a gaoler's office: yet if a gaoler suffer many negligent escapes, it is said that he puts it in the power of the Court to oust him of his office at discretion. (n)

Some regulations by statutes respecting the punishment of negligent escapes should also be noticed.

The 5 Edw. 3, c. 8, recites that persons indicted of felonies had removed the indictments before the King, and there yielded themselves, and had been incontinently let to bail by the marshals of the King's Bench; and enacts that such persons shall be safely and surely kept in prison: and (after providing for the manner of such confinement, &c.) further enacts, that if any such prisoner

A negligent escape may be pardoned by the King before it happens, but a voluntary one cannot be so pardoned. (p) Upon an indictment for an escape a pardon must be shown by the defendant by way of excuse. (q)

SEC. II.

Of Escapes suffered by Private Persons.

THE law with respect to escapes suffered by private persons is in general the same as in relation to those suffered by officers: it will be sufficient, therefore, to mention shortly the circumstances under which it is considered that a private person may be guilty of an escape, and the punishment to which he will be liable.

In what cases a private person will be guilty of an escape.

It seems to be a good general rule, that wherever any person has another lawfully in his custody, whether upon an arrest made by himself or another, he is guilty of an escape if he suffer him to go at large before he has discharged himself, by delivering him over to some other who by law ought to have the custody of him. And if a private person arrest another for suspicion of felony, and deliver him into the custody of another private person, who receives him and suffers him to go at large, it is said that both of them are guilty of an escape; the first, because he should not have parted with him till he had delivered him into the hands of a public officer; the latter, because, having charged himself with the custody of a prisoner, he ought, at his peril, to have taken care of him. (r)

But where a private person, having made an arrest for suspicion of felony, delivers over his prisoner to the proper officer, as the sheriff or his bailiff, or a constable, from whose custody the prisoner escapes, he will not be chargeable. He cannot, however, excuse himself from the escape by alleging that he delivered the prisoner over to an officer, without showing to whom, in particular, by name, he so delivered him, that the Court may certainly know who is answerable. The proper course, I apprehend, for a private person, who has arrested a person on suspicion of felony, is to take him as soon as he reasonably can before a magistrate, who will examine into the case, and either commit, bail, or discharge the party as the circumstances may require. C. S. G. See Reed v. Cowmeadow, 7 C. & P. 821, per Parke, B.; and Edwards v. Ferris, 7 C. & P. 542, Patteson, J.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-THIRD.

OF PRISON-BREAKING BY THE PARTY CONFINED.

Offence at common law, whether imprisonment were for a criminal or civil cause.

WHERE a party effects his own escape by force, the offence is usually called prison-breaking; and such breach of prison, or even the conspiring to break it, was felony at the common law, for whatever cause, criminal or civil, the party was lawfully imprisoned; (a) and whether he were actually within the walls of a prison or only in the stocks, or in the custody of any person who had lawfully arrested him. (b) But the severity of the common law is mitigated by the statute De frangentibus prisonam, 1 Edw. 2, stat. 2, which enacts, 'That none, from henceforth, that breaketh prison, shall have judgment of life or member for breaking of prison only; except the cause for which he was taken and imprisoned did require such judgment, if he had been convict thereupon, according to the law and custom of the realm.' Thus though to break prison and escape, when lawfully committed for any treason or felony, remains still felony as at common law; to break prison when lawfully confined upon any other inferior charge, is punishable only as a high misdemeanor, by fine and imprisonment. (c)

1 Edw. 2, st. 2.

What is a prison within the statute.

It will be proper to consider some of the points which have been holden in the construction of this statute.

Any place whatsoever wherein a person, under a lawful arrest for a supposed crime, is restrained of his liberty, whether in the stocks, or the street, or in the common gaol, or the house of a constable or private person, or the prison of the ordinary, is properly a prison within the meaning of the statute; for imprisonment is nothing else but a restraint of liberty. (d) The statute, therefore, extends as well to a prison in law as to a prison in deed. (e)

larity of the imprisonment.

With respect to the regularity of the imprisonment, it is clear, that if a person be taken upon a capias, awarded on an indictment or appeal against him for a supposed treason or felony, he is within the statute if he break the prison, whether any such crime were or were not committed by him or any other person; for there is an accusation against him on record, which makes his commitment lawful, however he may be innocent, or the prosecution groundless. And if an innocent person be committed by a lawful mittimus, on such a suspicion of felony, actually done by some other, as will justify his imprisonment, though he be neither indicted nor appealed, he is within the statute if he break the prison; for he was legally in custody, and ought to have submitted to it until he had been discharged by due course of law. (f)

But if no felony at all were done, and the party be neither indicted nor appealed, no mittimus for such a supposed crime will make him guilty within the statute, by breaking the prison; his imprisonment being unjustifiable. And though a felony were done, yet if there were no just cause of suspicion either to arrest or commit the party, his breaking the prison will not be felony if the mittimus be not in such form as the law requires; because the lawfulness of his imprisonment in such case depends wholly on the mittimus: but if the party were taken up for such strong causes of suspicion as will be a good justification of his arrest and commitment, it seems that it will be felony in him to break the prison, though he happen to have been committed by an informal warrant. (g)

The next inquiry will be as to the nature of the crime for which the party must be imprisoned, in order to make his breaking the prison felony within the meaning of the statute. It is clear that the offence for which the party was imprisoned must be a capital one at the time of his breaking the prison, and not become such by matter subsequent. (h) Though an offender breaking prison, while it is uncertain whether his offence will become capital, is highly punishable for his contempt, by fine and imprisonment. (i) But it is not material whether the offence for which the party was imprisoned were capital at the time of the passing of the statute, or were made so by subsequent statutes; for, since all breaches of prison were felonies by the common law, which is restrained by the statute only in respect of imprisonment for offences not capital, when an offence becomes capital, it is as much out of the benefit of the statute as if it had always been so. (k)

If the crime for which the party is arrested, and with which he is charged in the mittimus, do not require judgment of life or member, and the offence be not in fact greater than the mittimus supposes it to be, it is clear, from the express words of the statute, that his breaking the prison will not amount to felony. (l) And though the offence for which the party is committed be supposed in the mittimus to be of such a nature as requires a capital judgment, yet if, in the event, it be found to be of an inferior nature, and not to require such a judgment, it seems difficult to maintain that the breaking of the prison on a commitment for it can be felony; as the words of the statute are, 'except the cause for which he was taken and imprisoned require such a judgment.' (l) And on the other hand, if the offence which was the cause of the commitment be in truth of such a nature as requires a capital judgment, but be supposed in the mittimus to be of an inferior degree, it may probably be argued that the breaking of the prison by the party is felony within the meaning of the statute; for the fact for which he was arrested and committed does, in truth, require judgment of life, though the nature of it be mistaken in the mittimus. (m) It is not material whether the party who breaks his prison were under an accusation only, or actually attainted of the crime charged against him; for persons attainted, breaking prison, are as much within the exception of the statute as any others. (n)

A person committed for high treason becomes guilty of felony only, and not of high treason, by breaking the prison and escaping singly, without letting out any other prisoner: but if other persons, committed also for high treason, escape together with him, and his intention in breaking the prison were to favour their escape as well as his own, he seems to be guilty of high treason in respect of their escape, because there are no accessories in high treason; and such assistance given to persons committed for felony will make him who gives it an accessory to the felony, and by the same reason a principal in the case of high treason. (o)

The breach of the prison within the meaning of the statute must be an actual breaking, and not such force and violence only as may be implied by construction of law: therefore, if the party go out of a prison without any obstruction, the prison doors being open through the consent or negligence of the gaoler, or if he otherwise escape, without using any kind of force or violence, it is said that he is guilty of a misdemeanor only. (p) But the breaking need not be intentional; as where a prisoner made his escape from a house of correction, by tying two ladders together, and placing them against the wall of the yard, but in getting over threw down some bricks which were placed loose at the top (so as to give way upon being laid hold of), the judges were unanimously of opinion that this was a prison-breach. (q) And such breaking must be either by the prisoner himself, or by others through his procurement, or at least with his privity; for if the prison be broken by others without his procurement or consent, and he escape through the breach so made, it seems to be the better opinion that he cannot be indicted for the breaking, but only for the escape. (r) And the breaking must not be from the necessity of an inevitable accident happening, without the contrivance or fault of the prisoner; as if the prison should be set on fire by accident, and he should break it open to save his life. (s) It seems also that no breach of prison will amount to felony, unless the prisoner escape. (t)

victed of the crime for which he was imprisoned (the proceeding differing in this respect from cases of escape or rescue), on the ground that it is not material whether he be guilty of such crime or not, and that he is punishable as a principal offender in respect of the breach of prison itself. (u) But if the party has been indicted and acquitted of the felony for which he was committed, he is not to be indicted afterwards for the breach of prison; for though, while the principal felony was untried, it was indifferent whether he were guilty of it or not, or rather the breach of prison was a presumption of the guilt of the principal offence, yet, upon its being clear that he was not guilty of the felony, he is in law as a person never committed for felony; and so his breach of prison is no felony. (v)

Of the proceedings.

The indictment for a breach of prison, in order to bring the offender within the intention of the statute, must specially set forth his case in such manner that it may appear that he was lawfully in prison, and for such a crime as requires judgment of life or member: and it is not sufficient to say in general 'that he feloniously broke prison;' (w) as there must be an actual breaking to constitute the offence. (x) So it is held in all the books to be necessary that such breaking be stated in the indictment. (y)

By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 44, the certificate of the clerk of assize or other clerk of the court in which the offender was convicted, together with due proof of the identity of the person, is made evidence of the nature and fact of the conviction; and of the species and period of confinement to which such person was sentenced. (z)

Evidence.

The offence of prison-breaking and escape, by a party lawfully committed for any treason or felony, is, as we have seen, of the degree of felony, (a) and will of course be punishable as such: (b) but it should be observed, that it was a felony within clergy, though the principal felony for which the party was committed was ousted of clergy, as in case of robbery or murder. (c) And in this it differs from the offence of a voluntary escape, which is punishable in the same degree as the offence for which the party suffered to escape was in custody. (d) Where the prison-breaking is by a party lawfully confined upon any inferior charge, it is punishable as a high misprision, by fine and imprisonment. (e)

As prison-breach is a common law felony, if the person breaking prison is a convicted felon, it is punishable as such. The prisoner was found guilty upon an indictment, which charged that he had been convicted of horse-stealing, and sentenced to suffer death; and that his Majesty extended his mercy to him, on condition of being imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the House of Correction at Brixton Hill, for two years: that he was committed to and confined in the said house of correction; and that he, before the expiration of the two years, did feloniously break the said house of correction, and make his escape out of it, and go at large. The judges were unanimously of opinion that this was punishable as a common law felony by imprisonment not exceeding a year, to begin from the passing of the sentence; and that, if thought right, the prisoner might be whipped three times in addition to the imprisonment. CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FOURTH.

OF RESCUE; AND OF ACTIVELY AIDING IN AN ESCAPE, OR IN AN ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE.

RESCUE, or the offence of forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment, is, in most instances, of the same nature as the offence of prison-breaking, which has been treated of in the preceding chapter.

Of rescue.

Thus it is laid down, that whatever is such a prison that the party himself would, by the common law, be guilty of felony in breaking from it, in every such case a stranger would be guilty of as high a crime at least in rescuing him from it. But though, upon the principle that wherever the arrest of a felon is lawful the rescue of him is a felony, it will not be material whether the party arrested for felony, or suspicion of felony, be in the custody of a private person or of an officer; yet if he be in the custody of a private person, it seems that the rescuer should be shown to have knowledge of the party being under arrest for felony. (a) In cases where the imprisonment is so far groundless or irregular, or for such a cause, or the breaking of it is occasioned by such a necessity, &c., that the party himself breaking the prison is, either by the common law or by the 1 Edw. 2, st. 2, De frangentibus prisonam, saved from the penalty of a capital offender; a stranger who rescues him from such an imprisonment is, in like manner, also excused. (b)

Of the sort of prison, and of the imprisonment and breaking.

It has been stated in the preceding chapter, that, where a person committed for high treason breaks the prison and escapes, letting out other persons, committed also for high treason, he seems to be guilty of high treason, in case his intention in breaking the prison were to favour the escape of such other persons as well as his own: (c) and it is clear that a stranger who rescues a person committed for and guilty of high treason, knowing him to be so committed, is, in all cases, guilty of high treason. (d) It has been holden also, that he will be thus guilty whether he knew that the party rescued were committed for high treason or not: and that he would, in like manner, be guilty of felony by rescuing a felon, though he knew not that the party was imprisoned for felony. (e)

A rescuer may be guilty of high treason.

(e) Rex v. Benstead, Cro. Car. 583, where it is said that it was resolved by ten of the judges (on a special commission), seriatim, that the breaking of a prison where traitors are in durance, and causing them to escape, was treason, although the parties did not know that there were any traitors there: and that, in like manner, to break a prison whereby felons escape, is felony, without knowledge of their being imprisoned for such offence. And see 1 Hale, 606. But Hawkins (P. C. c. 21, s. 7), says that this opinion is

A breaking of the prison is not felony, unless a prisoner escape.

Of the proceedings in cases of rescue.

As the party himself seems not to be guilty of felony by breaking the prison, unless he actually go out of it, (f) so the breaking of a prison by a stranger, in order to free the prisoners who are in it, is said not to be felony, unless some prisoner actually by that means get out of prison. (g)

The sheriff's return of a rescue is not of itself sufficient to put the party to answer for it as a felony, without indictment or presentment. (h) And it is the better opinion that he who rescues one imprisoned for felony cannot be arraigned for such offence as a felony, until the principal offender be first attainted, (i) unless the person rescued were imprisoned for high treason, in which case the rescuer may be immediately arraigned; all being principals in high treason. But it is said that he may be immediately proceeded against for a misprision only if the King please: (k) and if the principal be discharged, or found guilty only of an offence not capital, such as petit larceny, &c., though the rescuer cannot be charged with felony, yet he may be fined and imprisoned for a misdemeanor. (l)

Of the indictment for a rescue.

The indictment for a rescue, like that for an escape, (m) or for breaking prison, (n) must specially set forth the nature and cause of the imprisonment, and the special circumstances of the fact in question. (o) And the word rescussit, or something equivalent to it, must be used to show that it was forcible and against the will of the officer who had the prisoner in his custody. (p)

Of the punishment for a rescue.

The rescue of one apprehended for treason is itself treason: and the party rescuing one in custody for felony, or suspicion of felony, will, as we have seen, be guilty of a crime of the same kind; though not in all cases punishable in the same degree; for the rescuer was entitled to his clergy, though the crime of the prisoner rescued were not within clergy. (q) Accordingly it was held that rescuing a person under commitment for burglary was not a transportable offence, but was punishable only as a felony, within clergy, at common law. (r) The 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 88, s. 1, has since enacted, 'that if any person shall rescue, or aid and assist in rescuing, from the lawful custody of any constable, officer, headborough, or other person whomsoever, any person charged with, or suspected of, or committed for any felony, or on suspicion thereof, then, if the person or persons so offending shall be convicted of felony, and be entitled to the benefit of clergy, and be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, it shall be lawful for the Court, by or before whom any such person or persons shall be convicted, to order and direct, in case it shall not proved by the authority of the case (1 Hen. 6, 5), on which it seems to be grounded. It should be mentioned, however, that Benstead's case is spoken of in Rex v. Burridge, 3 P. Wms. 468, as having been cited and allowed to be law at an assembly of all the judges of England, except the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in Limerick's case, Kel. 77.

(o) 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 21, s. 5. In Rex v. Westbury, 8 Mod. 357, it was holden that an indictment for a rescue of goods levied must set forth the fieri facias at large; and that setting forth quod cum virtute brevis, &c., de fieri facias, and a warrant thereon he levied, &c., and that the defendant rescued them, is not sufficient.

think fit, that such person or persons, instead of being so fined and imprisoned as aforesaid, shall be transported (s) beyond the seas for seven (t) years, or be imprisoned only, or be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol, house of correction, or penitentiary house, for any term not less than one (u) and not exceeding three years.'

Where the party rescued was in custody for a misdemeanor only, the rescuer will be punishable as for a misdemeanor; for, as those who break prison are punishable for a high misprision, by fine and imprisonment, in those cases wherein they are saved from judgment of death by the 1 Edw. 2, stat. 2, De frangentibus prisonam; so also are those who rescue such prisoners, in the like cases, punishable in the same manner. (v) Where a prisoner was indicted for a misdemeanor in aiding and assisting in the rescue of a person, who was apprehended and was in custody under the warrant of a justice of peace, which had been granted upon the certificate of the clerk of the peace of the county, reciting that a true bill for a misdemeanor had been found against the party apprehended; and it was objected that the warrant was illegal, as justices of peace had only authority to issue warrants upon oath made of the facts, which authorized the issuing such warrants: it was held that the warrant was legal, and that the prisoner was guilty of a misdemeanor, in assisting in the rescue of the person apprehended under it. (w)

misdemeanor.

It has been held to be a misdemeanor at common law to aid a person to escape from custody, who was confined under the remand of the Commissioners for the Relief of the Insolvent Debtors, and not on any criminal charge. (x)

The rescue of a prisoner in any of the superior courts, committed by the justices, is a great misprision; for which the party, and the prisoner (if assenting) will be liable to be punished by imprisonment for life, forfeiture of lands for life, and forfeiture of goods and chattels, though no stroke or blow were given. (y)

The aiding and assisting a prisoner to escape out of prison, by whatever means it may be effected, is an offence of a mischievous nature, and an obstruction to the course of justice: and the assisting a felon in making an actual escape, is an offence of the degree of felony. (z) In a case which underwent elaborate discussion, the Court of King's Bench held, that where a person assisted a prisoner who had been convicted of felony within clergy, and, having been sentenced to be transported for seven years, was in custody under such sentence, to escape out of prison, the person so assisting was an accessory after the fact to the felony. (a) The Court proceeded upon the ground that one so convicted of felony, within the benefit of clergy, and sentenced to be transported for seven years, continues a felon till actual transportation and service pursuant to the sentence; and that the assistance given in this case amounted, in law, to a receiving, harbouring, or comforting, such felon. (b) But they held the indictment to be defective, in not charging that the defendant knew that the principal was guilty, or convicted, of felony. (c) The offence of aiding a prisoner to escape out of prison appears also to have been considered as an accessorial offence in a case of piracy. On a return to a habeas corpus, in the case of one Scadding, who had been committed to the Marshalsea by the Court of Admiralty, the cause appeared to be for aiding and abetting one Exon, who was indicted for piracy, to escape out of prison; whereupon all the Court held that, though the fact were committed by Scadding, within the body of the county, yet, because it depended upon the piracy committed by Exon, of which the temporal judges had no cognizance, and was as it were an accessorial offence to the first piracy, which was determinable by the admiral, they must remand the prisoner. (d)

Aiding the escape of a clergyable felon, who had had his clergy and been burnt in the hand, but ordered, under 18 Eliz., to be imprisoned, would not, it should seem, have subjected the party to punishment as for aiding the escape of a felon. (e)

respecting the rescuing of prisoners, or aiding them to escape.

Several statutes, some of which have been already mentioned, and others which will be referred to in the course of the work, especially provide for the punishment of those who rescue or aid in the escape of persons apprehended or committed for the particular offences enumerated in those Acts. There are also some special provisions by statutes upon this subject, which may be noticed shortly in this place.

But any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his suffering the punishment to which he is condemned, is a sufficient receipt to make a man an accessory after the fact. Ante, p. 64.

The mere aiding an attempt of persons confined to make an escape, though no escape should ensue, is made highly penal by the 16 Geo. 2, c. 31, s. 1, (m) which enacts, that ‘if any person sentenced to transportation; and by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 85, s. 9, so much of the 4 Geo. 4, as relates to Canterbury, Lichfield, and Lincoln is repealed. Sec. 3. 'If any person shall aid or assist any prisoner to attempt to make his or her escape from the custody of any constable, headborough, tithingman, or other officer or person who shall then have the lawful charge of such prisoner, in order to carry him or her to gaol, by virtue of a warrant of commitment for treason, or any felony (except petty larceny), (p) expressed in such warrant; or if any person shall be aiding or assisting to any felon to attempt to make his escape from on board any boat, ship, or vessel, carrying felons for transportation, or from the contractor for the transportation of such felons, his assigns or agents, or any other person to whom such felon shall have been lawfully delivered, in order for transportation; every person so offending, and being convicted, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and be transported for seven years. (q)

Sec. 4. The prosecution for these offences must be commenced within a year.

The second section of this statute, relating to the conveying of instruments, &c., into any prison, in order to facilitate the escape of prisoners, makes the offender guilty, in cases where the prisoner is committed to or detained in any gaol for treason or felony expressed in the warrant of commitment. (r) This has been holden to mean that the offence should be 'clearly and plainly expressed'; so that a case where the commitment is on suspicion only is not within the Act, for these are two kinds of commitments, which essentially differ from each other; as a prisoner may be admitted to bail on a commitment for suspicion only, but not on a commitment for treason or felony clearly and plainly expressed in the warrant. (s) And this doctrine was recognized and acted upon in a subsequent case of an indictment upon the third section of the statute, which relates to the aiding a prisoner to escape from the custody of a constable having charge of him by virtue of a warrant of commitment for felony 'expressed' in such warrant. The indictment stated that the commitment was on 'suspicion' of burglary, and the warrant produced in evidence at the trial corresponded with this statement: and the judges were unanimously of opinion that a commitment on suspicion was not within the statute. (t)

A majority of the judges decided that the Act does not extend to cases where an actual escape is made, but must be confined to cases of an attempt, without effecting the escape itself. They said, 'The statute purports to be made for the further punishing of those persons who shall aid and assist persons attempting to escape, and makes the offence felony: it creates a new felony: but the offence of assisting a felon in making an actual escape was felony before: and therefore does not seem to fall within the view or intention of the Legislature when they made this statute.' And it also enacts, that a certificate of the clerk of assize, or other clerk of the court in which the offender was convicted, together with due proof of the identity of the person, shall be sufficient evidence of the nature and fact of the conviction, and of the species and period of confinement to which such person was sentenced. c. 64, extended, and that one Thompson was a prisoner in the said gaol, and that the defendant, at the parish aforesaid, feloniously did aid and assist Thompson, then and there being such prisoner, in attempting to escape from the said gaol; it was held on error that the count was good, though it did not allege the means by which the defendant aided Thompson in attempting to escape, and though it did not allege in direct terms that Thompson did attempt to escape. (b) Another count stated that Thompson, being a prisoner in the said gaol, so situate as aforesaid, was meditating and endeavouring to effect his escape from the said gaol, otherwise than by due course of law, and in order thereto had procured a key to be made with intent to effect his escape by means thereof, and had made to the defendant, then being a turn-key of the said gaol, overtures to induce him to aid him to escape from the said gaol, and so was endeavouring to procure his escape and to escape from the said gaol; and that the defendant, whilst Thompson was such prisoner in the said gaol at the parish aforesaid, &c., feloniously did procure and receive into his possession the said key, being adapted to and capable of opening divers locks in the said gaol, with intent thereby to enable Thompson to escape from the said gaol, and so the jurors said that the defendant at the parish aforesaid feloniously did aid and assist Thompson in attempting to escape from the said gaol; and it was held that the introductory part of the count stated an attempt to escape and the means used with sufficient particularity, and sufficiently showed an offence within the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, and that the count was not bad for want of a more particular venue to the acts charged in the introductory part as an attempt by Thompson to escape, and that the count was not double. (c) It was also held, that the general averment of the gaol being a gaol to which the provisions of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, applied was sufficient, without showing how it came within them, and that it was not necessary to show more particularly that the gaol was a gaol for the county within the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110, s. 2. (d) It was further held, that aiding an escape is a substantive offence under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 43, and therefore the count was not bad in charging the accessory without including the principal or alleging that he had been convicted, and at all events such an objection was too late after the trial. (e) It was also held, that it was not necessary to show that the prosecution was commenced within a year after the offence, as was required by the 16 Geo. 2, c. 31, s. 4. (f)

The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 82, established a prison for young offenders at Parkhurst, in the Isle of Wight; and sec. 13 provides for the punishment of persons rescuing or aiding in the rescue of such offenders; and sec. 14 provides for the trial and evidence on the trial in such cases. The 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, which was passed for the purpose of revising and consolidating the laws for regulating the transportation of offenders from Great Britain, and which will be more particularly noticed in the next chapter, by sec. 22, provides, that if any person shall rescue or attempt to rescue, or assist in rescuing or attempting to rescue, any offender sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished, from the custody of the superintendent or overseer, or of any sheriff or gaoler, or other person, conveying, removing, &c., such offender, or shall convey or cause to be conveyed any disguise, instrument for effecting escape, or arms, to such offender, every such offence shall be punishable in the same manner as if such offender had been confined in a gaol or prison in the custody of the sheriff or gaoler, for the crime of which such offender shall have been convicted. (g)

The two following sections relate to the indictment and the evidence, and will be found in the next chapter.

(g) The provisions of this Act are now applicable to prisoners sentenced to penal servitude, see post, p. 616.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIFTH.

OF RETURNING, OR BEING AT LARGE, AFTER SENTENCE OF TRANSPORTATION; AND OF RESCUING OR AIDING THE ESCAPE OF A PERSON UNDER SUCH SENTENCE.

As exile or transportation is a species of punishment unknown to the common law of England, and inflicted only under the sanction of enactments of the Legislature, offences committed by not submitting to that punishment are principally dependent upon the provisions of particular statutes. (a) But as a party convicted of felony within benefit of clergy, and sentenced to be transported for seven years, continues a felon, till actual transportation and service, pursuant to the sentence; and as it is a felony at common law to assist a felon to escape out of lawful custody; it has been holden that, independently of any statutable enactments, a person assisting such felon convict, being in custody under sentence of transportation, to escape out of prison, is an accessory to the felony after the fact, provided it be such an assistance as in law amounts to a receiving, harbouring, or comforting such felon. (b)

The 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, s. 1, recites, that the several laws in force for regulating the transportation of offenders from Great Britain, would expire at the end of the then present session of Parliament, and that it was expedient that the laws relative to that subject should be revised and consolidated into one Act; and then enacts that the Act shall take effect on the last day of that present session of Parliament; and that on and from that day all things remaining to be done, touching the punishment, imprisonment, correction, removal, transportation, discipline, employment, diet, and clothing of persons sentenced or ordered to transportation or banishment from any part of Great Britain, under any Acts theretofore or then in force, or pardoned on condition of being transported under any such Acts, shall be continued, done, and completed, under the provisions of that Act; and that all sentences and orders for transportation, all orders in council and other orders, warrants, instructions, directions, appointments, authorities, contracts, and securities, made, issued, or given under any of the said Acts, and in force at the time of the commencement of that Act, should continue in force under and by virtue of that Act, unless and until they should be revoked or superseded.

(a) In 6 Ev. Col. Stat. Part. V. Cl xxv. (G.) pp. 852, 853, the learned editor says, that the earliest Act which imposed the punishment of transportation was 39 Eliz. c. 4, which enacted that rogues, vagabonds, &c., might, by the justices in sessions, be banished out of the realm, and conveyed at the charges of the county to such parts beyond the seas as should be assigned by the privy council, or otherwise adjudged perpetually to the galleys of this realm; and any rogue so banished, and returning again into the realm, was to be guilty of felony. And he says that the earliest statute then subsisting which notices the power of transportation was 22 Car. 2, c. 5.

Offences by statutes. But assisting a felon sentenced to be transported to escape, makes the party an accessory after the fact at common law.

All persons sentenced or ordered for transportation are to be placed under the provisions of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 84.

Offenders adjudged for transportation are to be transported under the provisions of this Act. And also offenders receiving a conditional pardon concerning whom an allowance and order may be made by a subsequent Court.

Sec. 2. 'Every person convicted before any Court of competent jurisdiction in Great Britain, of any offence for which he or she shall be liable to be transported or banished, shall be adjudged and ordered to be transported or banished beyond the seas, for the term of life or years for which such offender shall be liable by any law to be transported or banished; and every sentence of transportation or banishment passed or to be passed on any offender, in any Court of competent jurisdiction in Great Britain, and every order for transportation or banishment made or to be made in pursuance of the sentence of any such Court or other competent authority, shall subject the offender to be conveyed beyond the seas, under the provisions of this Act; and whenever his Majesty shall be pleased to extend mercy to any offender convicted of any crime for which he or she is or shall be excluded from the benefit of clergy, upon condition of transportation beyond the seas, either for the term of life, or any number of years, and such intention of mercy shall be signified by one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state to the Court before which such offender hath been or shall be convicted, or any subsequent Court with the like authority, such Court shall allow to such offender the benefit of a conditional pardon, and make an order for the immediate transportation of such offender; and in case such intention of mercy shall be so signified to the judge or justice before whom such offender hath been or shall be convicted, or to any judge of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench or Common Pleas, or to any baron of the Exchequer of the degree of the coif in England, such judge, justice, or baron, shall allow to such offender the benefit of a conditional pardon, and make an order for the immediate transportation of such offender, in the same manner as if such intention of mercy had been signified to the Court during the term or session in or at which such offender was convicted; and such allowance and order shall be considered as an allowance and order made by the Court before which such offender was convicted, and shall be entered on the records of the same Court by the proper officer thereof, and shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes, and have the same consequences, as if such allowance and order had been made by the same Court during the continuance thereof: and every such order, and also every order made by the Court of Justiciary in Scotland for the transportation of any offender, whose sentence of death shall be remitted by his Majesty, shall subject the offender to be conveyed beyond the seas, under the provisions of this Act.'

Places of transportation to be appointed by his Majesty. And a secretary of state may authorize persons to make contracts for transportation.

Sec. 3. 'It shall be lawful for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, from time to time, to appoint any place or places beyond the seas, either within or without his Majesty's dominions, to which felons and other offenders under sentence or order of transportation or banishment shall be conveyed; and that when any offenders shall be about to be transported or banished from Great Britain, one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state shall give orders for their removal to the ship to be employed for their transportation, and shall authorize and empower some person to make a contract for their effectual transportation to some of the places so appointed, and shall direct security to be given for their effectual transportation, in the manner hereinafter mentioned.' (c) [444]

Sees. 4, 5, 7 provide for the delivery of offenders ordered to be transported to the contractors by the sheriff or gaoler, and for the giving of proper security by the contractors for their effectual transportation (except when such offenders are transported in King's ships). Sec. 6 gives authority to punish such offenders misbehaving themselves upon the voyage; and sec. 8 vests a property in their services during the term of transportation in the governor of the colony, &c. and his assignees. (d)

Sec. 10. 'It shall be lawful for his Majesty from time to time, by warrant under his royal sign manual, to appoint places of confinement within England or Wales, either at land, or on board vessels to be provided by his Majesty in the river Thames, or some other river, or within the limits of some port or harbour of England or Wales, for the confinement of male offenders under sentence or order of transportation, which shall be under the management of a superintendent and overseer, to be appointed by his Majesty; and that it shall be lawful for one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state to direct the removal of any male offender who shall be under sentence of death, but who shall be reprieved, or whose sentence shall be respited during his Majesty's pleasure, or who shall be under sentence or order of transportation, and who, having been examined by an experienced surgeon or apothecary, shall appear to be free from any putrid or infectious distemper, and fit to be removed from the gaol or prison in which such offender shall be confined, to any of the places of confinement so appointed; and every offender who shall be so removed shall continue in the said place of confinement or be removed to and confined in some other such place or places as aforesaid, as one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state shall from time to time direct, until such offender shall be transported according to law, or shall become entitled to his liberty, or until one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state shall direct the return of such offender to the gaol or prison from which he shall have been removed; and the sheriff or gaoler having the custody of any offender whose removal shall be ordered in manner aforesaid, shall with all convenient speed, after the receipt of any such order, convey or cause to be conveyed every such offender to the place appointed, and there deliver him to such superintendent or overseer, together with a true copy, attested by such sheriff or gaoler, of the caption and order of the Court by which such offender was sentenced or ordered for transportation, containing the sentence or order of transportation of each such offender, by virtue whereof he shall be in the custody of such sheriff or gaoler: and also a certificate, specifying concisely the description of his crime, his age, whether married or unmarried, his trade or profession, and an account of his behaviour in prison before and after his trial, and the gaoler's observations on his temper and disposition, and such information concerning his connexions and former course of life as may have come to the gaoler's knowledge; and such superintendent or overseer shall give a receipt in writing to the sheriff or gaoler for the discharge of such sheriff or gaoler.' (e)

Secs. 11, 12, authorized his Majesty to appoint a superintendent, an assistant to the superintendent, and an overseer for such places of confinement; specified the duties of the superintendent; and contained regulations for the cleansing, purifying, and clothing, the offenders brought to such places. (f)

His Majesty in council may direct convicts to be employed in any part of his dominions out of England under the management of a superintendent, &c.

Sec. 13. 'It shall be lawful for his Majesty, by any order or orders in council, to declare his royal will and pleasure, that male offenders convicted in Great Britain, and being under sentence or order of transportation, shall be kept to labour in any part of his Majesty's dominions out of England, to be named in such order or orders in council; and that whenever his Majesty's will and pleasure shall be so declared in council, it shall be lawful for one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state to direct the removal and confinement of any such male offender, either at land or on board any vessel to be provided by his Majesty, within the limits of any port or harbour in that part of his Majesty's dominions which shall be named in such order in council, under the management of the said superintendent, and of an overseer to be appointed by his Majesty for each such vessel or other place of confinement; and that every offender who shall be so removed shall continue on board the vessel or other place of confinement to be so provided, or any similar vessel or other place of confinement to be from time to time provided by his Majesty, until his Majesty shall otherwise direct, or until the offender shall be entitled to his liberty.' (g)

Declares the power and duties of the superintendent and overseer.

Sec. 15. 'After the removal of any offender under this Act, the superintendent and overseer, who shall have the custody of him, shall, during the term of such custody, have the same powers over him as are incident to the office of a sheriff or gaoler, and shall in

(e) By the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 67, s. 2, 'it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by an order in writing, to be notified in writing by one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, to direct that any persons under sentence or order of transportation within Great Britain shall be removed from the prisons in which they are severally confined to any other of Her Majesty's prisons or penitentiaries in Great Britain, there to be confined for such time as Her Majesty by any such order shall direct, not exceeding the time for which they might have been confined in the prisons from which they shall have been severally removed.' The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 121, recites the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 26, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39, and extends all the powers and provisions of sec. 10 of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, authorizing the appointment of places of confinement of males to the like places of confinement for females under sentence of transportation, and the removal to or from and the confinement in such places of females, and applies all the provisions of the recited Acts relating to the government of places appointed under sec. 10 to places appointed under this Act.

(f) The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 26, s. 1, repeals so much of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84 'as gives the custody and management of any male offenders out of England to the superintendent of convicts confined in England under sentence of transportation,' and provides that his powers may be exercised by the governor of the colony. The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 25, s. 1 repeals such parts of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84 'as relate to the control and management of offenders sent to be kept to hard labour at places out of England duly appointed for the purpose,' and such parts of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 26, 'as relate to the appointments of superintendent, deputy superintendent, and overseer respectively in places out of England;' and makes numerous provisions for the government of convict prisons abroad, the punishment of escapes and rescues, and the trial of such offences abroad.

(g) This clause is extended to male offenders sentenced in Ireland to be transported by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 67, s. 1. See the 6 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, for the punishment and trial of persons committing offences out of England, whilst kept to hard labour under this section.

like manner be answerable for any escape of such offender; and if any offender shall during such custody be guilty of any misbehaviour or disorderly conduct, the superintendent or overseer shall be authorized to inflict or cause to be inflicted on him such moderate punishment or correction as shall be allowed by one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state; and such superintendent or overseer shall also, during such custody, see every offender fed and clothed according to a scale of diet and clothing to be fixed on and notified in writing by one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state to the superintendent; and shall keep such offender to labour at such places, and under such regulations, directions, limitations, and restrictions, as by such secretary of state shall from time to time be prescribed; and in case of the absence of any such superintendent or overseer, or of the vacancy of his office, his duties or powers shall be discharged and exercised in all respects by the officer or person on whom the command of the place of confinement shall devolve.'

By sec. 16, the superintendent is also empowered to act as a justice of the peace.

Sec. 17. 'Whenever any convict adjudged to transportation by any Court or judge, in any part of his Majesty's dominions not within the United Kingdom, or any convict adjudged to suffer death by any such Court or judge, and pardoned on condition of transportation, has been or shall be brought to England in order to be transported, it shall and may be lawful to imprison any such offender in any place of confinement provided under the authority of this Act, until such convict shall be transported, or shall become entitled to his liberty; and that so soon as every such convict shall be so imprisoned, all the provisions, rules, regulations, clauses, authorities, powers, penalties, matters and things aforesaid, concerning the safe custody, confinement, treatment, and transportation, of any offender convicted in Great Britain, shall extend and be construed to extend to every convict, who may have been or may be hereafter adjudged to transportation by any Court or judge in any part of his Majesty's dominions not within the United Kingdom, and to every convict adjudged by any such Court or judge to suffer death, and pardoned on condition of transportation, and brought to England in order to be transported, as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes, as if such convict had been convicted and sentenced at any session of gaol delivery holden for any county within England.'

Sec. 18, it shall be lawful to keep to hard labour every offender under sentence or order of transportation, while he or she shall remain in the common gaol, if his or her health will permit; and if one or more of the visiting justices shall give a written order to that effect; and that it shall be lawful for one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, if he shall think fit, to order that any such offender be removed from the common gaol to the house of correction, and there kept to hard labour. By sec. 19, the time during which any offender shall continue in any gaol or house of correction, or in any such place of confinement as aforesaid, under sentence or order of transportation, is to be reckoned in discharge or part discharge of the term of transportation or

Sec. 22. 'If any offender who shall have been or shall be so sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished, or who shall have agreed or shall agree to transport or banish himself or herself on certain conditions, either for life or any number of years, under the provisions of this or any former Act, shall be afterwards at large within any part of his Majesty's dominions, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term for which such offender shall have been sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished, or shall have so agreed to transport or banish himself or herself, every such offender so being at large, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without the benefit of clergy; and such offender may be tried either in the county or place where he or she shall be apprehended, or in that from whence he or she was ordered to be transported or banished; and if any person shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, or assist in rescuing or attempting to rescue, any such offender from the custody of such superintendent or overseer, or of any sheriff or gaoler, or other person conveying, removing, transporting, or reconveying him or her, or shall convey, or cause to be conveyed, any disguise, instrument for effecting escape, or arms, to such offender, every such offence shall be punishable in the same manner as if such offender had been confined in a gaol or prison, in the custody of the sheriff or gaoler, for the crime of which such offender shall have been convicted; and whoever shall discover and prosecute to conviction any such offender so being at large within this kingdom, shall be entitled to a reward of twenty pounds for every such offender so convicted.' Where a certificate under the preceding section stated that the prisoner had been convicted of two larcenies, and sentenced to two several terms of transportation of seven years each for the said larcenies, Patteson, J., held that it sufficiently complied with the requisitions of the statute to be admissible in evidence in support of an indictment against a prisoner for escaping from custody whilst under sentence of transportation. prison.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 29, s. 14, an Act for establishing a prison at Pentonville, authorizes the removal of male convicts under sentence of transportation to Pentonville; and by sec. 16, every such convict is to continue there until transported, conditionally pardoned, entitled to his freedom or until the Secretary of State directs his removal; but every such convict is to be within the provisions of the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84, if the Secretary directs his removal from Pentonville; and by sec. 22, the Secretary may order any convict to be removed as incorrigible from Pentonville; and in such case the convict is liable to be transported under his original sentence, in the same manner as if no order had been made to send him to Pentonville; and by sec. 24, 'every convict who shall be ordered to be imprisoned in the Pentonville prison, who at any time during the term of such imprisonment shall break prison, or who, while being conveyed to such prison, shall escape from the person or persons having the lawful custody of such convict, shall be punished by an addition not exceeding three years to the term of his imprisonment, and if afterwards convicted of a second escape or breach of prison shall be adjudged guilty of felony; (o) and every convict in the Pentonville prison who at any time during the term of his imprisonment shall attempt to break prison, or who shall forcibly break out of his cell, or make any breach therein with intent to escape therefrom, shall be punished by an

(o) As no punishment is specially provided by this Act for this offence, it is punishable under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, ss. 8, 9; and 1 Vict. c. 90, s. 5, ante, p. 3; and the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, p. 4; and so are the principals in the second degree and accessories before the fact, ante, p. 67; and as to accessories after the fact, see ante, p. 69.

(p) Sec. 13 makes every person rescuing or aiding in the rescue of such offenders guilty of felony; and sec. 14 makes offenders triable where they are apprehended, or where the escape, &c. was, and makes the order of commitment evidence, and provides for the costs of the prosecution.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26, s. 12, an Act for regulating the prison at Millbank, authorizes the removal of convicts under sentence of transportation to Millbank; and by sec. 14, every such convict shall continue there until transported, conditionally pardoned, entitled to his freedom, or until the Secretary of State directs his removal; but every such convict is to be within the provisions of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, if the Secretary directs his removal from Millbank; and by sec. 20, the Secretary may order any convict to be removed as incorrigible from Millbank; and in such case the convict is liable to be transported under his original sentence in the same manner as if no order had been made to send him to Millbank; and by sec. 22, 'every convict in the Millbank prison who at any time during the term of his or her imprisonment shall break prison, or who, while being conveyed to such prison, shall escape from the person or persons having the lawful custody of such convict, shall be punished by an addition not exceeding three years to the term of his or her imprisonment, and if afterwards convicted of a second escape or breach of prison shall be adjudged guilty of felony; (r) and every convict in the Millbank prison who at any time during the term of his imprisonment shall attempt to break prison, or who shall forcibly break out of his or her cell, or make any breach therein with intent to escape therefrom, shall be punished by an addition not exceeding twelve calendar months to the term of his or her imprisonment.' Convicts sentenced to transportation may be removed to Millbank.

Punishment of convicts for breaking prison.

The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, an Act to substitute in certain cases other punishment in lieu of transportation, introduced the punishment of penal servitude; and secs. 1, 2, 3, 4, provided for the cases in which that punishment might be awarded; but these sections are repealed by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 1, and by sec. 2, the sentence of transportation is abolished and penal servitude substituted for it; (t) and by sec. 7, the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99 and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, are to be read as one Act.

By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, s. 5, 'Whenever Her Majesty, or the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time being, shall be pleased to extend mercy to any offender convicted of any offence for which he may be liable to the punishment of death, upon condition of his being kept to penal servitude for any term of years or for life, such intention of mercy shall have the same effect and may be signified in the same manner, and all Courts, justices, and others shall give effect thereto and to the condition of the pardon in like manner, as in the cases where Her Majesty or the Lord Lieutenant or other chief

(q) Sec. 25 provides for the punishment of persons rescuing or aiding the rescue of convicts; and sec. 28 makes offenders triable at the Central Criminal Court, or where they are taken, and makes a copy of the order of commitment evidence.

(r) The Act assigns no punishment to this felony; therefore it is punishable under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, ss. 8, 9; and 1 Vict. c. 90, s. 5, ante, p. 3; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, p. 4; and principals in the second degree are punishable like principals in the first degree; and as to accessories see ante, pp. 67, 69.

(s) Sec. 23 provides for the punishment of persons rescuing or assisting the rescue of convicts; and sec. 26 makes every offender triable at the Central Criminal Court, or where he is taken, and makes a copy of the order of commitment evidence.

governor or governors of Ireland for the time, is or are now pleased to extend mercy upon condition of transportation beyond seas; the order for the execution of such punishment as Her Majesty, or the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time being, may have made the condition of her, his, or their mercy being substituted for the order for transportation.'

Persons under sentence or order of penal servitude how to be dealt with.

Sec. 6. 'Every person who under this Act shall be sentenced or ordered to be kept in penal servitude may, during the term of the sentence or order, be confined in any such prison or place of confinement in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any river, port, or harbour of the United Kingdom, in which persons under sentence or order of transportation may now by law be confined, or in any other prison in the United Kingdom, or in any part of Her Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, or in any port or harbour thereof, as one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state may from time to time direct; and such person may during such term be kept to hard labour and otherwise dealt with in all respects as persons sentenced to transportation may now by law be dealt with while so confined.'

All Acts, &c., concerning convicts sentenced to transportation made applicable for the purposes of this Act.

Sec. 7. 'All Acts and provisions of Acts now applicable with respect to persons under sentence or order of transportation shall, so far as may be consistent with the express provisions of this Act, be construed to extend and be applicable to persons under any sentence or order of penal servitude under this Act; and all the powers and provisions contained in the Act of the fifth year of King George the fourth, chapter eighty-four, authorizing the appointment by Her Majesty from time to time of places of confinement as therein mentioned for male offenders under sentence or order of transportation, and authorizing Her Majesty to order male offenders convicted in Great Britain and under sentence or order of transportation to be kept to hard labour in any part of Her Majesty's dominions out of England, shall extend and be applicable to and for the appointment by Her Majesty of like places of confinement in any part of the United Kingdom for offenders (whether male or female) sentenced under this Act in any part of the United Kingdom, and to and for the ordering of such offenders to be kept to hard labour in any part of Her Majesty's dominions out of England; and all the provisions of the said Act concerning the removal to or from and confinement in the places of confinement in or out of England, appointed under the said Act, of the offenders therein-mentioned, and all Acts and provisions of Acts now in force concerning or relating to the regulation and government of such places of confinement, and the custody, treatment, management, and control of or otherwise in relation to the offenders confined therein, shall, so far as the same may be consistent with the express provisions of the Act, extend and be applicable to and for the removal to and from and confinement in the places of confinement appointed under this Act of the offenders sentenced in any part of the United Kingdom, and otherwise be applicable to and in respect of such places of confinement and the offenders to be confined therein.' writing under the hand and seal of one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, to grant to any convict now under sentence of transportation, or who may hereafter be sentenced to transportation, or to any punishment substituted for transportation by this Act, a license to be at large in the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, or in such part thereof respectively as in such license shall be expressed, during such portion of his or her term of transportation or imprisonment, and upon such conditions in all respects as to Her Majesty shall seem fit; and it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to revoke or alter such license by a like order at Her Majesty's pleasure.'

Sec. 10. 'So long as such license shall continue in force and unrevoked, such convict shall not be liable to be imprisoned or transported by reason of his or her sentence, but shall be allowed to go and remain at large according to the term of such license.'(v) licenses to be at large to convicts under sentence of transportation.

Holder of license not to be imprisoned, &c., by reason of his sentence.

Sec. 11. If it shall please Her Majesty to revoke any such license, a Secretary of State by warrant under his hand, may signify to any police magistrate of the metropolis that such license has been revoked, and may require such magistrate to issue his warrant for the apprehension of the convict, and the magistrate shall issue his warrant accordingly, and the warrant shall be executed by the constable to whom it shall be delivered for that purpose in any part of the United Kingdom, or in Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, or Sark, and the convict when apprehended shall be brought before the magistrate who issued the warrant, or some other magistrate of the same court; and he shall thereupon make out his warrant for the recommitment of the convict to the prison from which he was released, and such convict shall be re-committed accordingly 'and shall thereupon be remitted to his or her original sentence, and shall undergo the residue thereof as if no such license had been granted.'

The 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 3, reciting that the provisions applicable to persons under sentence of transportation extend to persons under penal servitude only when they are conveyed to and kept in places of confinement appointed under the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84, and that it is expedient to extend the provisions, enacts that 'any person now or hereafter under sentence or order of penal servitude may, during the term of the sentence or order, be conveyed to any place or places beyond the seas to which offenders under sentence or order of transportation may be conveyed, or to any place or places beyond the seas which may be hereafter appointed as herein mentioned; and all Acts and provisions now applicable to and for the removal and transportation of offenders under sentence or order of transportation to and from any places beyond the seas, and concerning their custody, management, and control, and the property in their services, and the punishment of such offenders if at large without lawful cause before the expiration of their sentence, and all other provisions now applicable to and in the case of persons under sentence or order of transportation, shall apply to and in the case of persons under sentence or order of penal servitude, as if they were persons under sentence or order of transportation.'

Existing power to appoint places of transportation to be applicable for the purposes of this Act.

Sec. 4. 'The provisions and powers of the said Act of the fifth year of King George the Fourth, authorizing the appointment (by Her Majesty, with the advice of her privy council), of any place or places beyond the seas to which felons and other offenders under sentence or order of transportation shall be conveyed, and all other powers of Her Majesty, or the Lord Lieutenant or chief governor or governors of Ireland, for the like purpose, shall extend and be applicable to and for the appointment of any place or places beyond the seas to which offenders under sentence or order of penal servitude may be conveyed, as herein provided.'

Magistrates may recommit convicts whose licenses are revoked to any convict prison.

Sec. 5, reciting sec. 11 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, enacts that 'any such convict may be recommitted by the magistrate issuing his warrant in that behalf, either to the prison from which he was released by virtue of his license, or to any other prison in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude may be lawfully confined.'

All enactments referring to transportation to have reference to penal servitude.

Sec. 6. 'Where in any enactment now in force the expression "any crime punishable with transportation," or "any crime punishable by law with transportation," or any expression of the like import, is used, the enactment shall be construed and take effect as applicable also to any crime punishable with penal servitude.'

Mutiny Act provides for the punishment of persons returning from transportation after sentence by a court-martial.

The Mutiny Acts also make provision for the punishment of persons returning from transportation after sentence by a court-martial. By the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 8, s. 15, persons committing the offences therein specified shall suffer death. By sec. 16, in all cases where a capital punishment shall have been awarded by a general court-martial, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, or, in any place out of the United Kingdom or British Isles, for the commanding officer, to order the offender to be kept in penal servitude as therein mentioned. By sec. 17, any officer or soldier guilty of embezzling stores may be sentenced to penal servitude. By sec. 18, whenever Her Majesty shall intend that any sentence passed by any court-martial shall be carried into effect for the term specified in such sentence, or for any shorter term, or shall be pleased to commute any sentence of death, the same shall be notified in writing to any judge of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, in England or Ireland, and thereupon such judge shall make an order for the penal servitude of such offender, in conformity with such notification; 'and every person so ordered to be kept in penal servitude shall be subject to every provision made by law and in force concerning persons under sentence of penal servitude; and from the time when such order of penal servitude shall be made, every Act in force touching the escape of felons, or their afterwards returning, or their being at large without leave, shall apply to such offender, and to all persons aiding and abetting, contriving, or assisting in any escape and intended escape, or the returning without leave of any such offender.' The judge, who makes any such order of penal servitude, is to direct the said notification and order to be filed of record in the office of the clerk of the Crown of the Queen's Bench, who is, on application, to deliver a certificate in writing to such offender, or to any person applying in his or Her Majesty's behalf, 'showing the christian and surname of such offender, his offence, the place where the Court was held before which he was convicted, and the conditions on which the order of penal servitude was made, which certificate shall be sufficient proof of the conviction and sentence of such offender and also of the terms, on which such order for his penal servitude was made, in any Court and in any proceeding wherein it may be necessary to inquire into the same.' Provisions of a nature nearly similar are usually contained in the Acts relating to the regulating of the royal marine forces while on shore. (x)

The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 62, s. 7, authorizes offenders under sentence of a naval court-martial to be confined in naval prisons; and sec. 8 provides for the punishment of persons aiding the escape of such offenders.

Naval prisons.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 7, regulates the manner of remitting, either absolutely or conditionally, the whole or any part of the term of transportation in the colonies. The 6 Geo. 4, c. 69, regulates the punishment of offences committed by transports sent to labour in the colonies.

It may be useful to mention some of the points decided upon the statutes which formerly related to the offences treated of in this chapter.

Points on former statutes.

Where an indictment alleged that the prisoner 'was at large without any lawful excuse within Her Majesty's dominions, before the expiration of the time' for which he had been transported; Patteson, J., held the indictment bad for omitting the word 'feloniously'; for the statute, by enacting that the offender 'shall suffer death as in cases of felony,' clearly made the offence felony. (y)

Where a capital convict had a conditional pardon and escaped, and the indictment against him stated that the King's pleasure was notified to the Court, and the Court thereupon ordered, &c., according to the terms of the pardon, and the notification was to the judge after the assizes were over, and he made the order; the judges were unanimous that the notification to the judge, and the order by him, was not a notification to the Court, or any order by the Court, and that the indictment was not proved. (z) But the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, enacts that it shall be sufficient to allege in the indictment the order for transportation, without alleging any indictment, trial, &c., or any pardon or intention of mercy, or signification thereof. (a) The statute, however, requires that the certificate to be given in evidence shall contain the effect and substance of the indictment and conviction; and in a case which arose upon the 6 Geo. 1. c. 23 (now repealed), which required that the certificate should contain the effect and tenor of the indictment and conviction, and of the order and contract for transportation, and also upon the 24 Geo. 3, c. 56, s. 5 (now repealed), which required a certificate containing the effect and substance only, omitting the formal part of the indictment and conviction, the indictment stated that the prisoner was convicted of grand larceny within benefit of clergy, and the certificate was in the same form; and the judges, upon the point being reserved, held that both were insufficient. (b) So also in another case, upon the 56 Geo. 3, c. 27, s. 8, which required the certificate to contain the effect and substance only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction, and order for transportation, it was held that an indictment which stated that the prisoner had been convicted of felony, without stating the nature of that felony, and a certificate which stated only that the prisoner had been convicted of felony, were insufficient; and the prisoner was remitted to his former sentence. (c) But where on an indictment for returning from transportation, the certificate put in alleged that the prisoner had been convicted of two larcenies, and sentenced to two several terms of transportation for seven years each for the said larcenies; Patteson, J., held that the certificate was sufficient. (d) So where on a similar indictment the certificate put in alleged that the prisoner was 'in due form of law convicted of feloniously and burglariously breaking and entering the dwelling-house of T. D., and feloniously and burglariously stealing therein one piece of the current gold coin,' &c., and 'was thereupon ordered to be transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life;' Williams, J., held that the certificate sufficiently stated the sentence of transportation. (e) So where on a similar indictment the certificate put in stated that 'at the general quarter sessions of the peace of our Lady the Queen,' holden at M. in the county of K., the prisoner was in due form of law tried and convicted; Patteson, J., held that the certificate sufficiently described the court by which the prisoner had been tried. (f) The prisoner was indicted under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, s. 22, for being at large before the expiration of the term for which he was transported. A certificate of the clerk of the peace was put in to prove the conviction and sentence, and it appeared therefrom that the prisoner had been convicted of larceny at the sessions, and sentenced to be transported for fourteen years. It was objected that the sessions had no jurisdiction to pass that sentence for simple larceny, and therefore the judgment was a nullity: but it was held that the judgment was valid until it was reversed, and that was enough. (g)

The prisoner was indicted under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 22, for being at large before the expiration of the term for which he had been transported. A certificate of the previous conviction and sentence was produced, in the following form:—'I, John Gorst, deputy clerk of the peace for the county palatine of Lancaster, and clerk of the courts of general quarter sessions of the peace, holden in and for the said county, and having the custody of the records of general quarter sessions of the peace holden in and for the said county, do hereby certify that at the general quarter sessions of the peace, holden at Salford, in the said county,' &c.

(g) Reg. v. Finney, 2 C. & K. 774, Alderson, B., who consulted several of the judges.

This document was signed by J. Gorst, who acted as clerk of the peace for the said county. R. J. Harpur was the clerk of the peace for the county, but he never discharged the duties of the office but by deputy, and he had three deputies, E. Gorst, J. Gorst, and T. Burchall, who were attorneys and partners. Sometimes one and sometimes another of them attended the sessions and acted as clerk of the peace: at some sessions both E. & J. Gorst attended; there was no clerk of the court of sessions except the clerk of the peace. The sessions records for forty years past had been kept at the office of the three, at Preston. It was submitted that the certificate did not conform to the provisions of the statute, as Harpur was the clerk of the court, and had the legal custody of the records, and this certificate was only by his deputy; but Coltman, J. overruled the objection. (h)

Where an indictment stated the condition upon which the royal mercy was extended to have been general, whereas it was that the prisoner should be transported to places specified, the variance was held to be fatal. (i)

Where the prisoner had received a pardon on condition of transporting himself beyond the seas, within fourteen days from the day of his discharge, and it was incumbent on the prosecutor to prove the precise day on which the prisoner was discharged, it was holden that the daily book of the prison, containing entries of the names of the criminals brought to the prison, and the times when they were discharged, though generally made from the information of the turnkeys, or from their endorsements on the backs of the warrants, was good evidence to prove the time of the prisoner's discharge. (k) And it was held that though, if a convict on his trial for returning from transportation before his time was expired, should confess the fact, and acknowledge that he is the man, the Court would record such confession; yet, no such confession being made, it was necessary to produce the record of conviction, and give evidence of the prisoner's identity. (l)

Where a convict was sentenced to transportation for seven years, and received a sign manual, promising him a pardon, 'on condition of his giving a security to transport himself for that period within fourteen days,' and upon his giving such security was discharged from prison, but neglected to transport himself within the fourteen days: it was holden that he could not be indicted for being unlawfully found at large before the term for which he had received sentence of transportation had expired, on the ground that such sign manual, and the recognizance entered into in consequence of it, were good evidence that he was lawfully at large: although he had not substantially performed the condition on which the promise of pardon was granted. It appears that the judges considered that the sign manual was improperly worded by mistake of the officer: that it should have been 'upon condition of the said Miller transporting himself, &c., and of his giving security to the satisfaction,' &c. and not merely 'upon condition of his giving security,' &c., and that though the King might revoke his intended grace on account of this apparent fraud, yet, as he had not in fact

As to the offender being referred to his original sentence of transportation.

In the last case, the prisoner was referred to his original sentence of transportation, as not having performed the condition upon which his pardon was to be granted; that is, he was pardoned on condition of transporting himself within fourteen days. (n) And in another case it was holden, that a prisoner convicted of a capital crime, whose sentence was respited during the King's pleasure, and who, having received a pardon on condition of transportation for life, was afterwards found at large in Great Britain without lawful cause, should be referred to his original sentence. (o) In a subsequent case, where the prisoner, having been convicted of simple grand larceny, had received judgment of transportation to America for seven years, but had afterwards been pardoned, 'on condition of transporting himself beyond the seas' for the same term of years, within fourteen days from the day of his discharge, and of giving security so to do, and, upon giving the security required, had been discharged, but had not complied with the other part of the condition, by transporting himself, it was doubted whether he could be convicted of a capital felony in being found at large, without any lawful cause, before the expiration of the term, or whether he ought to be remitted to his former sentence. The former cases were cited as authorities that the prisoner's discharge was a lawful cause for his being at large, notwithstanding he had forfeited the recognizance of himself and his bail, by breaking the other part of the condition, in not transporting himself within the fourteen days: but one of the judges thought that, as the prisoner had not complied with the terms on which he was pardoned, he must be considered as having been at large without lawful authority, as soon as the fourteen days had expired. Another judge considered it as a doubtful question whether the nonperformance of the condition had not revoked it, and as the prisoner had literally complied with the condition, he ought not to have been convicted upon an indictment for being found at large, without any lawful cause, before the expiration of his term. With respect, however, to a condition being considered precedent or subsequent, it has been holden that no precise technical words are requisite for that purpose; that it does not depend upon its being prior or posterior in the deed, but that it depends upon the nature of the contract, and the acts to be performed by the parties. *Robinson v. (n) Miller's case, 1 Leach, 76.

(o) Madan's case, Old Bailey, 1780. 1 Leach, 223. In 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 47, tit. Return from Transportation, s. 23 (referring to Cas. C. L. 197), this case is cited as having decided that the prisoner was so referred back to his original sentence, on his being indicted for returning from transportation, and acquitted. But in the report in Leach, it is said that no indictment was ever preferred against the prisoner for the new felony; but that, being in custody, a notice was served upon him to show cause why execution should not be awarded against him on his former sentence: that after this notice he was put to the bar, and his identity and the record of his former conviction proved; and he not being prepared to prove the truth of certain facts alleged in his defence, the Court gave their opinion that, as he had broken the condition of the pardon, he remained in the same state in which he was at the time the pardon was granted, namely, under sentence of death, with a respite of that sentence during his Majesty's pleasure. The report further states, that afterwards it was submitted to the judges, whether the prisoner would not have been liable to suffer death without benefit of clergy, if he had been indicted and convicted under the 8 Geo. 3, c. 15, or whether he had been properly referred to his original sentence. No opinion of the judges is stated: but it appears that at the Old Bailey, April Sess. 1782, the prisoner was informed by the Court that it was his Majesty's pleasure that he should be transported to Africa for life.

rendered the whole pardon null and void: and he also thought that the offence with which the prisoner was charged was not within the 16 Geo. 2, c. 15, because he had not agreed to transport himself to America; and that it was not within the 19 Geo. 3, c. 74, because that Act related only to pardons granted to offenders who had been convicted of felonies by which they were excluded from clergy. (p)

In the last-mentioned case, one point was clearly agreed upon, namely, that as the prisoner had, at the time of his discharge, a real intention to quit the kingdom within the time, but had been prevented from carrying it into execution by the distress of poverty and ill-health, these impediments amounted to a lawful excuse. (q)

(p) Aickle's case, Old Bailey, 1785, cor. Gould, J., Hotham, B., and Adair, Recorder. The Recorder thought that the indictment was perfectly supported under the clause of the 16 Geo. 2, c. 15, adopted by 19 Geo. 3, c. 74, which made it a capital felony to be found at large in Great Britain within the term for which a convict, who was liable to be transported to America, had received sentence to be transported beyond the seas. But he thought that when the condition of the king's pardon was broken, the pardon was gone. There being, however, a difference of opinion, it was intended to have submitted the case to the opinion of the twelve judges, if the prisoner had been found guilty.

Poverty and ill-health amount to a lawful excuse for not having quitted the kingdom.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SIXTH.

OF GAMING.

Playing at cards, &c., as a recreation, and for moderate sums, is not any offence. But otherwise as to gaming.

IT seems that by the common law, the playing at cards, dice, &c., when practised innocently and as a recreation, the better to fit a person for business, is not at all unlawful, nor punishable as any sort of offence: but a person guilty of cheating, as by playing with false cards, dice, &c., may be indicted for it at common law, and fined and imprisoned according to the circumstances of the case and heinousness of the offence. (a) We have seen that common gaming-houses are considered as nuisances in the eye of the law; (b) and that lotteries have been declared to be public nuisances, except as they may have been authorized by Parliament. (c) And when the playing is, from the magnitude of the stake, excessive, and such as is now commonly understood by the term gaming, it is considered by the law as an offence, being in its consequences most mischievous to society. In most cases, however, the party was subjected only to pecuniary penalties, recoverable by information, or by summary or civil proceedings: but there were some offences which, by statute, might be prosecuted by indictment. But these enactments have been repealed.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 1, repealed so much of the 16 Car. 2, c. 7, 10 Will. 3 (I.), 9 Anne, c. 14, 11 Anne (I.), 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 16, 5 Geo. 2 (I.), 11 & 12 Geo. 3 (I.), 45 Geo. 3, c. 72, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, as enacted that 'any note, bill, or mortgage shall be absolutely void.' (d) The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 15, repeals 'so much of' the 16 Car. 2, c. 7, 10 Will. 3 (I.), 9 Anne, c. 14, and 11 Anne (I.), 'as was not altered by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41.' It seems, therefore, that, as far as the subject of this chapter is concerned, the whole of these four last-mentioned Acts are repealed. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 15, also repeals 'so much of' the 18 Geo. 2, c. 34, 'as relates to' the 9 Anne, c. 14, 'or as renders any person liable to be indicted and punished for winning or losing, at play or by betting, at any one time, the sum or value of ten pounds, or within the space of twenty-four hours the sum or value of twenty pounds.' This seems to repeal secs. 3 and 8 of the 18 Geo. 3, c. 34. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 1, also repeals parts of the 33 Hen. 8, c. 9.

By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 17, 'every person who shall, by any fraud or unlawful device or ill practice in playing at or with cards, dice, tables, or other game, or in bearing a part in the stakes, wagers, or adventures, or in betting on the sides or hands of them that do play, or in wagering on the event of any game, sport, pastime, or exercise, win from any other person to himself, or any other or others, any sum of money or valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of obtaining such money or valuable thing from such other person by a false pretence, with intent to cheat or defraud such person of the same, and, being convicted thereof, shall be punished accordingly.'

This section comprises several distinct branches:—

I. Any fraud or unlawful device or ill-practice in playing at or with cards, dice, tables, or other games; and under this clause the offence consists in the fraud, unlawful device, or ill-practice, and it seems perfectly immaterial whether the game be or be not lawful.

II. Any fraud or unlawful device or ill-practice in bearing a part in the stakes, wagers, or adventures on the sides or hands of them that do play; and here, too, the offence consists in the fraud, and not in the nature of the game.

III. Any fraud, or unlawful device or ill-practice in betting on the sides or hands of them that do play; and here, also, the same remark applies.

IV. Any fraud or unlawful device or ill practice in wagering on the event of any game, sport, pastime, or exercise; and here, also, the same remark applies. On the whole, therefore, the gist of every offence created by this section appears to be the fraud, unlawful device, or ill-practice; and therefore it seems unnecessary to cite the numerous civil cases decided on the following section.

The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, enacts, that 'all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made: provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or toward any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise.'

Wagers not recoverable at law.

As it is impossible to foresee that some of the points decided on the repealed enactments may not be useful in cases that may arise on the new Act, they are briefly mentioned. A foot race, whether the race were upon a given distance, or against a certain time, was a game prohibited by 9 Anne, c. 14. (e) And a wager that a person did not find within such a time a man who should carry on foot twenty-four stone weight ten miles in fifteen hours has been holden to be within the same principle. (f) But where A. betted B. that one C. would not run four miles in twenty-one minutes, it was adjudged not to be within the statute, because as C. was not playing at such game, there could be no betting on his side within the statute; for C. might be running for his amusement, and not to win any bet. (g) It was, however, held, that laying above ten pounds on a horse race was an illegal bet within the statute of Anne, on the ground that the statute ought to be extended to all sports as well as games, in order to prevent excessive betting. (h) And a wager of ten pounds to five pounds upon a horse race was within this statute, although the race was for a legal plate. (i) Cricket also was held an unlawful game within this statute. (k) It was held also, that if two persons played at cards from Monday evening to Tuesday evening, without any interruption, except for an hour or two at dinner, and one of them won a balance of seventeen guineas, this was won at one sitting within the statute. (l)

If a loser preferred an indictment against a winner on this statute of Anne, and the grand jury found the bill, the Court would not permit an information to be filed against the defendant, although

And it has been holden that a wager on a horse race for less than £50 could not be recovered in an action: the 13 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 2, having prohibited such races. Johnson v. Bann, 4 T. R. 1, and see Bidmead v. Gale, 4 Burr. 2432. And that a wager, though for more than £50, that the plaintiff could perform a certain journey in a post-chaise and pair of horses in a given time, could not be so recovered. Ximenes v. Jaques, 6 T. R. 499. Nor a like wager, that a single horse should go from A. to B. on the high road sooner than one of two other horses to be placed at any distance their owner should please; these being transactions prohibited by 16 Car. 1, c. 7, s. 2, and 9 Anne, c. 14, and not legalized by 13 Geo. 2, c. 19, or 18 Geo. 2, c. 34, which relate to bonâ fide horse-racing only. Whaley v. Pajot, 2 Bos. & Pul. 51. So it has been held that an innocent indorsee for valuable consideration could not recover on a bill given in payment of a bet above £10, lost at a legal horse race. Shillito v. Theed, 7 Bing. 405. So an agreement by which the defendant sold the plaintiff a horse for £200, if he trotted eighteen miles within an hour, but for one shilling if he failed, was illegal. Brogden v. Marriott, 3 Bing. N. C. 88. So a bet of £10 on a legal horse race was prohibited by the 9 Anne, c. 14. Thorpe v. Coleman, 1 C. B. 990. Where a plea stated that a horse race was about to be run, and that an illegal game called a lottery, not authorized by law, was set up by the defendant for certain subscribers of £1 each, to be paid to the defendant under regulations which amounted in substance to this, that the subscriber whose name should be drawn out of a box next after the name of the horse was drawn out of another box, which horse should be placed first in the race, should be entitled to receive from the defendant £100, it was held that this was an illegal lottery within the 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17, and 42 Geo. 3, c. 119; and that, admitting that the transaction was more properly in the nature of a bet, it clearly fell within the 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 2. Allport v. Nutt, 1 C. B. 974. Gatty v. Field, 9 Q. B. 421. S. P., where it was doubted whether these cases would be affected by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, which passed after they arose. But in Batty v. Marriott, 5 C. B. 818, where two persons agreed to run a foot-race, and each of them deposited £10 with another person, the whole £20 to be paid over to the winner; it was held that the case was within the proviso in sec. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and the transaction lawful. But this case was doubted in Parsons v. Alexander, 5 E. & B. 263, where Lord Campbell, C. J., said 'the enacting part of the section includes all gaming and wagering whether on lawful or unlawful games, not merely gaming and wagering among bystanders, but also between the players, and it applies as well to deposits to abide the event of a wager as to other bets. The proviso must be read in conjunction with that enactment. But for the case of Batty v. Marriott, I should have said that proviso was confined to cases in which persons contributed to a plate or something analogous to a plate.' And it was held accordingly that where a defendant played with the plaintiff and others in a public billiard-room at billiards and at pool, at first for small stakes which he won, then for increasing stakes which he lost, and each player contributed from time to time during the game, and according to its chances, to a stake, which was carried off by the ultimate winner, the case was not within the proviso in sec. 18. So money lent for the purpose of playing at an illegal game, such as hazard, cannot be recovered back. M'Kinnell v. Robinson, 3 M. & W. 434. And it was ruled that no action could be maintained on a wager on a cock-fight. Squires v. Whisken, 3 Campb. 140. And see as to the offence of keeping a cock-pit, ante, p. 444.

the indictment was quashed, and, of course, the defendant never tried upon it; for the grand jury might find another bill for the same offence. (m)

Upon the ground that the judgment of the Court was only quod convictus est, and was to be the foundation of an action to recover the penalty, it was urged in one case, that it was necessary to prove the sum precisely as laid in the indictment; but Lord Ellenborough, C. J., was of opinion that although, if the prosecutor had averred in the indictment that the defendants had won any bills of exchange of a specified amount, the allegation must have been proved as laid; yet that since the sum only was averred, and that under a videlicet, the prosecutor was entitled to prove the winning of a smaller sum. (n)

Where a person lost money by gaming, and paid it by a cheque on a banker, which was cashed by the banker on a subsequent day in a different parish, it was held, that the offence prohibited by the 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 2, was committed where the money was lost and won, and not where the cheque was cashed; and that such a transaction was substantially a gaming for ready money, and not a gaming on credit. (o) And a strong opinion was given that the statute was not confined to gaming for ready money; for the statute was not confined to money lost, but extended to other things; and it was a very violent construction to suppose that it was intended only to apply to goods that a party might have about his person at a gambling-house. Why should it not apply to horses, or wine, or any other commodity not of a portable nature, and which, therefore, could not be delivered until the following day at the least? (p)

An indictment alleged that the prisoner by fraud, unlawful device, and ill-practice in playing at and with cards, unlawfully did win from one H. F. Bernard to a certain person unknown a certain sum of money, with intent to cheat the said H. F. Bernard of the same, and it was moved, in arrest of judgment, that the indictment was bad for not alleging the ownership of the money won; but, upon a case reserved, it was held that the indictment was sufficient, as it described the offence in the words of the statute. (q)

In the preceding case some of the judges intimated an opinion that the offence might be committed, although no money were actually paid; as the word 'win' might be construed in the sense of obtaining a title to a sum of money by becoming the winner of a stake; but such a construction is plainly inconsistent with the latter part of the clause, for how can a person, who merely obtains a title to a thing, 'be deemed guilty of obtaining such money or valuable thing from such other person?' If, however, a case were to occur where every other ingredient of the offence were proved except the payment of the money, the party might be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9.

appeared that the prisoners began to play at skittles in the prosecutor's presence; and B., one of them, appeared to be very drunk, and played so badly that he lost every game; and the others then persuaded the prosecutor to play with B., and stake large sums upon the game, for he was sure of winning; and the prosecutor accordingly did play with B. several games for large sums, every one of which he lost; and the prisoners, having got all the prosecutor's money, ran away; it was contended that there must be fraud in the act of playing, and here the fraud was before the game commenced; and the Recorder held, that the fraud relied on must be a fraud put in practice during the game itself. (r)

Where the three prisoners being at a public-house with the prosecutor, one of them, in concert with the others, placed a pen-case on the table and left the room, and whilst he was absent one of the others took the pen out of the case, and put a pin in its place, and the two prisoners induced the prosecutor to bet with the third prisoner when he returned that there was no pen in the case, and the prosecutor staked fifty shillings, and on the pen-case being turned up another pen fell into the prosecutor's hand, and the prisoners took the money; it seems to have been considered clear that this case did not come within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 17. (r) Reg. v. Bailey, 4 Cox C. C. 390. The prisoners were convicted of a conspiracy to cheat. It was also contended that the game of skittles was not within the first clause of the section; that the words 'other game' must be confined to the same sort of games as those previously specified, which were all games of chance; and that the game of skittles was more reasonably included within the latter branch of the clause: but no opinion was expressed on this point.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SEVENTH.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO DEAD BODIES.

It is an indictable offence to take up a dead body, even for the purpose of dissection. Upon an indictment for this offence it was moved in arrest of judgment, that if it were any crime, it was one of ecclesiastical cognizance only; that it was not made penal by any statute; and that the silence of Stamford, Hale, and Hawkins, upon this subject, afforded a very strong argument to show that there was no such offence cognizable in the criminal courts. But the Court said, 'that common decency required that the practice should be put a stop to; that the offence was cognizable in a criminal Court, as being highly indecent, and contra bonos mores; at the bare idea alone of which nature revolted. That the purpose of taking up the body for dissection did not make it less an indictable offence: and that, as it had been the regular practice of the Old Bailey, in modern times, to try charges of this nature, many of which had induced punishment, the circumstance of no writ of error having been brought to reverse any of these judgments was a strong proof of the universal opinion of the profession upon this subject; and they, therefore, refused even to grant a rule to show cause, lest that alone should convey to the public an idea that they entertained a doubt respecting the crime alleged.' (a) To sell the dead body of a capital convict for the purposes of dissection, where dissection is no part of the sentence, is a misdemeanor, and indictable at common law. (b)

It is an offence against decency to take a person's dead body, with intent to sell or dispose of it for gain and profit. An indictment charged (inter alia) that the prisoner a certain dead body of a person unknown lately before deceased wilfully, unlawfully, and indecently did take and carry away, with intent to sell and dispose of the same for gain and profit; and it being evident that the prisoner had taken the body from some burial ground, though from what particular place was uncertain, he was found guilty upon this count. And it was considered that this was so clearly an indictable offence, that no case was reserved. (c)

It is a misdemeanor at common law to remove without lawful authority a corpse from a grave in a burying-ground of a con-

It is a misdemeanor to disinter a corpse.

Com. 236, 237, stealing a corpse is mentioned as a matter of great indecency; and the law of the Franks is mentioned (as in Montesqu. Sp. L. b. 30, ch. 19), which directed, that a person who had dug a corpse out of the ground, in order to strip it, should be banished from society, and no one suffered to relieve his wants till the relations of the deceased consented to his readmission.

gregation of Protestant dissenters; and it is no defence to such a charge that the motive for removing the corpse was pious and laudable. The indictment charged the defendant with unlawfully entering a burial-ground belonging to a congregation of Protestants dissenting from the Church of England, and unlawfully and indecently opening the grave of Louisa Sharpe, and unlawfully and indecently carrying away her body. The defendant's mother and some other relations had been buried in one grave in the burying-ground of a congregation of dissenters at Hitchin, with the consent of those that were interested. The defendant's father had recently died, and the defendant prevailed on the wife of the person who had the key of the burying-ground to allow him to cause the said grave to be opened, upon the pretext that he wished to bury his father in that grave, and in order to examine whether the size of the grave would admit his father's coffin. He caused the coffins of his step-mother and two children to be taken out, and so came to the coffin of his mother, which was under theirs, and was much decomposed, and caused the remains of this coffin, with the corpse therein, to be placed in a shell and carried to a cart and driven some miles away towards a churchyard where he intended to bury his father's corpse with the remains of his mother. These acts were done without the consent of the congregation or the trustees having the legal estate in the ground; and the jury found that the statement of the defendant that he intended to bury his father there was only a pretext, and that his real intention from the beginning was to remove his mother's corpse; but that he acted throughout without intentional disrespect to anyone, being actuated by motives of affection to his mother and of religious duty: and, upon a case reserved, Erle, J., delivered judgment: 'We are of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The defendant was wrongfully in the burial-ground, and wrongfully opened the grave, and took out several corpses, and carried away one. We say he did this wrongfully, that is to say, by trespass; for the license which he obtained to enter and open from the person who had the care of the place, was not given or intended for the purpose to which he applied it, and was, as to that purpose, no license at all. The evidence for the prosecution proved the misdemeanor, unless there was a defence. We have considered the grounds relied on in that behalf, and, although we are fully sensible of the estimable motives on which the defendant acted, namely, filial affection and religious duty, still neither authority nor principle would justify the position that the wrongful removal of a corpse was no misdemeanor if the motive for the act deserved approbation. A purpose of anatomical science would fall within that category. Neither does our law recognize the right of any one child to the corpse of its parent as claimed by the defendant. Our law recognizes no property in a corpse, and the protection of the grave at common law, as contradistinguished from ecclesiastical protection to consecrated ground, depends upon this form of indictment, and there is no authority for saying that relationship will justify the taking a corpse away from the grave where it has been buried.' (d)

‘A man is bound to give Christian burial to his deceased child, if he has the means of doing so; but he is not liable to be indicted for a nuisance for not burying his child, if he has not the means of providing burial for it. He cannot sell the body, put it into a hole, or throw it into a river; but unless he has the means of giving the body Christian burial, he is not liable to be indicted, even though a nuisance may be occasioned by leaving the body unburied, for which the parish officer would probably be liable.’ (e) The prisoner was indicted for having neglected and refused to bury the body of his deceased child, whereby a nuisance was created. The prisoner, at the time of the death of his child, was a pauper receiving parochial relief from a parish in the Leicester union, and soon after the death of the child he applied to the relieving officer of that parish for assistance to bury the child. The relieving officer required the prisoner to sign an undertaking, on demand, to repay the guardians of the union the sum advanced by way of loan in payment for the coffin and ground for the child. (f) This was refused by the prisoner, and the relieving officer refused to render him any assistance in the burial of the child, and the body in consequence remained unburied and occasioned a nuisance. The jury were directed that the prisoner was bound to provide for the burial of his deceased child, if he could by any lawful way procure the means of doing so; and that as the prisoner had been offered relief for the purpose of burial by way of loan, he was bound to receive it, and that consequently he was not excused from his liability to provide for the interment of the deceased, and was liable to be convicted for the nuisance. But, upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that this direction was wrong; for although it was perfectly true that the prisoner, if he had the means, was bound to provide for the burial of his child, yet he was not bound to incur a debt for that purpose, and consequently he was not bound to accept the loan on the terms proposed to him. (g)

The refusal or neglect to bury dead bodies by those whose duty it is to perform the office, appears also to have been considered as a misdemeanor. Thus, Abney, J., in delivering the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, said, ‘The burial of the dead is (as I apprehend) the duty of every parochial priest and minister; and if he neglect or refuse to perform the office, he may, by the express words of Canon 86, be suspended by the Ordinary for three months. And if any temporal inconvenience arise, as a nuisance, from the neglect of the interment of the dead corpse, he is punishable also by the temporal Courts, by indictment or information.’ (h)

(e) Lord Campbell, C. J., in Reg. v. Vann, 2 Den. C. C. 325. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 31, enacts that it shall be lawful for guardians, or where there are no guardians, for the overseers to bury the body of any poor person, which may be within their parish or union respectively, and to charge the expense thereof to any parish under their control, to which such person may have been chargeable, or in which he may have died, or otherwise in which such body may be.

(f) This was done under an order of the poor law commissioners and an order of the guardians.

(g) Reg. v. Vann, supra.

(h) Andrews v. Cawthorne, Willes, 537, note (a). Abney, J., cited a case, H. 7 G. 1, B. R. where that Court made a rule upon the Rector of Daventry, in Northamptonshire, to show cause why an information should not be filed, because he neglected to bury a poor parishioner who died in that parish. See this case as

A parent is not indictable for not burying his child unless he has the means so to do.

The refusal or neglect to bury dead bodies is a misdemeanor.

It was held, after elaborate argument, that a child who has received the outward and visible form of baptism by a dissenting minister, not being a lawful minister of the Church of England, nor episcopally ordained, is to be considered as baptized, and is entitled to have the burial service read at its interment by the clergyman of the parish in which it dies; and that the refusal to read the service over a child so baptized brings the party so refusing within the provisions of Canon 86, and the Court is bound to pronounce that the party is subject to suspension for three months, and also to the costs of the proceedings. (i)

The right to burial is a common law right; but the mode of it is under the ecclesiastical law.

The right of sepulture in the parish churchyard is a common law right; but the mode of burial a subject of ecclesiastical cognizance alone. If therefore a clergyman were absolutely to refuse to bury the body of a dead person brought for interment in the usual way, it seems that the Court of Queen's Bench would grant a mandamus to compel him to inter the body; but that Court will not grant a mandamus to compel a clergyman to bury a body in an unusual and extraordinary manner, e.g. in an iron coffin. (k)

Every one is entitled to be buried.

Every person dying in this country and not within certain exclusions laid down by the ecclesiastical law, has a right to Christian burial; and that implies the right to be carried from the place where his body lies to the parish cemetery. (l) The common law casts on some one the duty of carrying to the grave, decently covered, the dead body of any person dying in such a state of indigence as to leave no funds for that purpose. (m) It should seem that the person under whose roof a poor person dies is bound to carry the body, decently covered, to the place of burial: he cannot keep him unburied, nor do anything which prevents Christian burial: he cannot, therefore, cast him out, so as to expose the body to violation, or to offend the feelings or endanger the health of the living: and, for the same reason, he cannot carry him uncovered to the grave. It will probably be found, therefore, that where a pauper dies in any parish house, poor house, or union house, that circumstance casts on the parish or union, as the case may be, to bury the body; not by virtue of the statute of Elizabeth, but on the principles of the common law. (n) But the duty is not cast upon the overseers, where the death does not take place under the roof of any parish house, or that which, under the circumstances, may be considered as such. A married woman residing with her husband in a parish was admitted as an inpatient in a hospital in that parish, and died in it, and the husband was unable from poverty to take the body away and bury it; he was receiving weekly relief from the parish and he believed that he was settled in it. (i) Mastin v. Escott, decided in the Arches Court of Canterbury, May 8, 1841, by Sir H. Jenner, and reported by Dr. Curteis. The ground of this decision was that a child baptized by a layman was validly baptized, and a Wesleyan minister, by whom the child was baptized, could

had been requested to bury the body, but had refused. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the burial of a pauper receiving relief, but not dying in any parish house, was not within the objects of the 43 Eliz. c. 2, expressed or implied; and, after laying down the principles above stated, held that those principles would rather cast the burden on the hospital than on the parish, and formed an additional, though not a necessary reason for holding that the parish was not bound to bury the body. (o)

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 31, makes it lawful for guardians, or where there are no guardians for overseers, to bury the body of any poor person which may be within their parish or union, and to charge the expense to any parish within their control to which such person may have been chargeable, or in which he may have died, or otherwise in which such body may be; and unless the guardians, in compliance with the desire of such person expressed in his lifetime, or by any of his relations, or for any other cause, direct the body to be buried in the churchyard or burial-ground of the parish to which such person has been chargeable (which they are authorized to do), every dead body which the guardians or any of their officers duly authorized shall direct to be buried at the expense of the poor-rates shall (unless the deceased person or the husband or wife or next of kin of such deceased person have otherwise desired) be buried in the churchyard or other consecrated burial-ground in or belonging to the parish, division of parish, chapelry or place in which the death may have occurred; and, after providing for the burial fees, the clause forbids any officer connected with the relief of the poor to receive any money for the burial of the body of any poor person, or to act as undertaker for personal gain or reward, or to receive any money from any dissecting school or school of anatomy or hospital or from any person to whom any such body may be delivered, or to derive any personal emolument for or in respect of the burial or disposal of any such body, under a penalty recoverable before two justices of the peace. (p)

The 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 75, 'An Act for regulating Schools of Anatomy,' authorizes the Secretary of State for the Home Department to grant 'a license to practise anatomy to any fellow or member of any college of physicians or surgeons, or to any graduate or licentiate in medicine, or to any person lawfully qualified to practise medicine in any part of the United Kingdom, or to any professor or teacher of anatomy, medicine, or surgery, or to any student attending any school of anatomy, on application from such party for such purpose, countersigned by two of his Majesty's justices of the peace acting for the county, city, borough, or place wherein such party resides, certifying that, to their knowledge or belief, such party so applying is about to carry on the practice of anatomy.'

2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 75. Secretary of State may grant licenses to practise anatomy.

Sec. 2. The Secretary of State may appoint inspectors of places where anatomy is carried on; and by sec. 3, may direct what district such inspectors shall superintend. Sec. 4, every inspector is to make a quarterly return to the Secretary of State of every body that, during the preceding quarter, has been removed for examination to every separate place in his district where anatomy is carried on, distinguishing the sex, and, as far as is known at the time, the name and age of each person whose body was so removed.

Sec. 5. Inspectors may visit and inspect, at any time, any place, within their district, notice of which place has been given, that it is therein intended to practise anatomy.

Persons having lawful custody of bodies may permit them to undergo anatomical examination in certain cases.

Sec. 7. 'It shall be lawful for any executor or other party having lawful possession of the body of any deceased person, and not being an undertaker or other party intrusted with the body for the purpose only of interment, to permit the body of such deceased person to undergo anatomical examination, unless, to the knowledge of such executor or other party, such person shall have expressed his desire, either in writing at any time during his life, or verbally in the presence of two or more witnesses during the illness whereof he died, that his body after death might not undergo such examination, or unless the surviving husband or wife, or any known relative of the deceased person, shall require the body to be interred without such examination.'

Provision in case of persons directing anatomical examinations after their death.

Sec. 8. 'If any person, either in writing at any time during his life, or verbally in the presence of two or more witnesses during the illness whereof he died, shall direct that his body after death be examined anatomically, or shall nominate any party by this Act authorized to examine bodies anatomically to make such examination, and if, before the burial of the body of such person, such direction or nomination shall be made known to the party having lawful possession of the dead body, then such last-mentioned party shall direct such examination to be made, and, in case of any such nomination as aforesaid, shall request and permit any party so authorized and nominated as aforesaid to make such examination, unless the deceased person's surviving husband or wife, or nearest known relative, or any one or more of such person's nearest known relatives, being of kin in the same degree, shall require the body to be interred without such examination.'

The body not to be removed from the place without a certificate.

Sec. 9. No body is to be removed for anatomical examination from the place where such person died until after forty-eight hours from the death, nor unless a certificate, stating in what manner such person came by his death, shall have been given by the medical man who attended such person, or who examined the body after death.

Professors, surgeons, and others may receive bodies for anatomical examination.

Sec. 10. 'It shall be lawful for any member or fellow of any college of physicians or surgeons, or any graduate or licentiate in medicine, or any person lawfully qualified to practise medicine in any part of the United Kingdom, or any professor, teacher, or student of anatomy, medicine, or surgery, having a license from his Majesty's principal Secretary of State or chief secretary as aforesaid, to receive or possess for anatomical examination, or to examine anatomically, the body of any person deceased, if permitted or directed so to do by a party who had at the time of giving such permission or direction lawful possession of the body, and who had power, in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, to permit or cause the body to be so examined, and provided such certificate as aforesaid were delivered by such party together with the body.'

Sec. 11. Such persons are to receive a certificate with the body, and transmit it and a return of the time the body was received, and other matters, to the inspector of the district.

Sec. 12. Notice is to be given to the Secretary of State of places where anatomy is intended to be practised.

Sec. 13. Bodies are to be removed in a decent coffin or shell, and after undergoing anatomical examination are to be decently interred in consecrated ground, or in some public burial-ground, in use for persons of that religious persuasion to which the person whose body was so removed belonged.

Sec. 14. 'No member or fellow of any college of physicians or surgeons, nor any graduate or licentiate in medicine, nor any person lawfully qualified to practise medicine in any part of the United Kingdom, nor any professor, teacher, or student of anatomy, medicine, or surgery, having a license from his Majesty's principal Secretary of State or chief secretary as aforesaid, shall be liable to any prosecution, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment for receiving or having in his possession for anatomical examination, or for examining anatomically, any dead human body, according to the provisions of this Act.'

Persons described in this Act not to be liable to punishment for having in their possession human bodies.

Sec. 15. The Act is not to prohibit any post mortem examination directed by competent authority.

Sec. 18. 'Any person offending against the provisions of this Act in England or Ireland shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being duly convicted thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or by a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, at the discretion of the Court before which he shall be tried; and any person offending against the provisions of this Act in Scotland shall, upon being duly convicted of such offence, be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or by a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, at the discretion of the Court before which he shall be tried.'

Offences against this Act.

Sec. 19. 'The words "person" and "party" shall be respectively deemed to include any number of persons, or any society, whether by charter or otherwise; and the meaning of the aforesaid words shall not be restricted although the same may be subsequently referred to in the singular number and masculine gender only.'

Interpretation of certain words in this Act.

The prisoner, the master of a workhouse, was indicted for disposing of the dead bodies of some of the paupers who died in the workhouse, for the purpose of dissection, and for gain and profit to himself. He had in collusion with an undertaker caused the bodies of several paupers to be shown to their relatives in coffins, and every appearance of regular funerals to be gone through, and the relatives followed to the cemetery what they supposed to be the body of the deceased, when in reality just before the funeral left the workhouse, other coffins were substituted for those the relatives had seen, and the bodies were in the evening taken to Guy's Hospital for dissection, all the necessary formalities required by the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 75, having been duly complied with. In no case did the relatives of the deceased persons in terms require that their bodies should be buried without anatomical examination; and indeed they appeared to have believed that the bodies were buried without any such examination. It did not appear that the prisoner made any regular charge to the hospital or surgeons in respect of the bodies supplied to them; but in 1856 he received £19 10s., and in 1857, £26 from Guy's Hospital, as gratuities for his trouble in going through the formalities, giving the notices, and obtaining the certificates required by the Anatomy Act, and the amount paid him was in proportion to the number of bodies supplied. These payments were in contravention of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 31. The jury found that the prisoner caused the dead bodies of four paupers to be delivered to the undertaker, and delayed the burial of them for an unreasonable length of time, in order that they might be dissected in the meantime, and that he did so for gain and profit for himself; and that he caused the appearance of a funeral of such bodies to be gone through, with a view to prevent their relatives requiring the bodies to be interred without being subject to anatomical examination, and that, but for such supposed funeral, the relatives would have required the bodies to be buried without anatomical examination. It was objected that the prisoner having lawful possession of the bodies as master of the workhouse, might lawfully do what he had done, as no relative had required the bodies to be buried without anatomical examination; and upon a case reserved it was held that this objection was valid, as all that was done by the prisoner was done according to law, for he had legal possession of the bodies, and he did with them that which the law authorized him to do. And though he fraudulently prevented the relatives from requiring the bodies to be buried without anatomical examination, yet that did not take away the protection given to him by the statute. (q)

48 Geo. 3, c. 75, provides for the interment of dead bodies cast on shore from the sea.

Provision has been made by statute for the suitable interment of such dead bodies as may be cast on shore from the sea. The 48 Geo. 3, c. 75, enacts, that the churchwardens and overseers of parishes in England, in which any dead body shall be found thrown in, or cast on shore from the sea, shall, upon notice of the body lying within their parishes, cause the same to be forthwith removed to some convenient place; and with all convenient speed to be decently interred in the churchyard or burial-ground of such parishes: and if the body be thrown in, or cast on shore in any extra-parochial place, where there is no churchwarden or overseer, a similar duty is imposed upon the constable or headborough of such place. (r)

It is further enacted, that every minister, parish clerk, and

(q) Reg. v. Feist, D. & B. C. C. 590. This decision seems clearly wrong, as the master of a workhouse is plainly merely the servant of the guardians or parish officers, and the possession of the workhouse is in them. Governors of the poor of Bristol v. Wait, 5 A. & E. 1. And the master of a workhouse has no more possession of the things in the workhouse than any servant of the things in his master's house. The dealing with the dead bodies by the prisoner was, therefore, a wholly illegal act. The Court intimated that possibly the prisoner and undertaker might have been indicted for a conspiracy to prevent the relatives making the requisition; or that the prisoner might be indicted for preventing the requisition being made. Quare, whether an indictment would have lain for causing the funeral service to be performed over the empty coffins?

sexton, of the respective parishes, shall perform their duties as is customary in other funerals, and admit of such dead body being interred, without any improper loss of time; receiving such sums as in cases of burials made at the expense of the parishes. (s) The statute provides also as to the expenses of such burials, and the raising of money to defray them; gives a reward of five shillings to the persons first giving notice to the parish officers, or to the constable or headborough of an extra-parochial place, of any dead body being cast on shore; and imposes a penalty of five pounds on persons finding dead bodies and not giving notice, and on parish officers neglecting to execute the Act. (t) An appeal to the quarter sessions is also given to any person thinking himself aggrieved by anything done in pursuance of the Act. (u)

The preventing a dead body from being interred has been considered as an indictable offence. Thus, the master of a workhouse, a surgeon, and another person, were indicted for a conspiracy to prevent the burial of a person who had died in a workhouse. (v) And though Hyde, C. J., upon a question how far the forbearance to sue one who fears to be sued, is a good consideration for a promise, (w) cited a case where a woman who feared that the dead body of her son would be arrested for debt was holden liable, upon a promise to pay in consideration of forbearance, though she was neither executrix nor administratrix; (x) yet the other judges are said to have doubted of this; (y) and in a recent case, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said it would be impossible to contend that such a forbearance could be a good consideration for an assumpsit. (z) Lord Ellenborough, C. J., continued, 'to seize a dead body upon any such pretence would be contra bonos mores, and an extortion upon the relatives.' And in a subsequent part of the case, his Lordship said, 'As to the case cited by Hyde, C. J., of a mother who promised to pay on forbearance of the plaintiff to arrest the dead body of her son, which she feared he was about to do, it is contrary to every principle of law and moral feeling: such an act is revolting to humanity, and illegal.'

A gaoler has no right to detain the body of a person who died in prison for any debts due to himself. Where, therefore, a gaoler refused to deliver up the body of a person, who had died while a prisoner in execution in his custody, to the executors of the deceased, unless they would satisfy certain claims made against the deceased by the gaoler, the Court of Queen's Bench issued a mandamus, peremptory in the first instance, commanding that the body should be delivered up to the executors. (a) And a gaoler is indictable at common law for detaining the body of a person who has died in gaol in order to compel the payment of certain claims made by the gaoler. An indictment stated that a prisoner had died in gaol, and the body remained in gaol in the possession of the defendant, then being gaoler; and the executors requested him to deliver up the body to them, and suffer them to take it away, in order that they might bury it: and it thereupon became the defendant's duty to deliver up the body, but that he refused to do so, and unlawfully, and in abuse of his office, without legal authority or excuse, and against the will of the executors, detained the body a long time in gaol, until the defendant unlawfully and indecently buried the body without any rite of Christian burial, or any funeral ceremony or observance, in a place not being a consecrated burial-ground, or a customary or fit place for burial; (to wit), a yard within the precincts of the gaol. The second count alleged a refusal to deliver up, &c., unless the executors would account with the defendant concerning certain claims of money, which he pretended to have against the deceased's estate, and pay the defendant what should appear due; that the defendant wrongfully detained, &c., under pretext of such claims, the executors not accounting, &c., until, &c., when he buried, &c. Maule, J., said, at the close of the case, that the notion of a gaoler being authorized to detain a dead body on account of pecuniary claims was a mistake, and that a gaoler doing so was guilty of a misconduct in his public character, for which he was liable to prosecution. (b)

So also is the preventing a minister from performing the burial service.

An indictment will lie for wilfully obstructing and interrupting a clergyman in reading the burial service, and interring a corpse; but such an indictment must allege that the person obstructed was a clergyman, and that he was in the execution of his office, and lawfully burying the corpse; and it must also show how the party was obstructed, as by setting out the threats and menaces used. And it is not sufficient to allege that the party did unlawfully, by threats and menaces, prevent the burial. (c)

The interment of the body of a person who has died a violent death before the coroner is sent for is a misdemeanor.

There is one case in which the too speedy interment of a dead body may be an indictable offence; namely, where it is the body of a person who has died of a violent death. In such case, by Holt, C. J., the coroner need not go ex officio to take the inquest, but ought to be sent for, and that when the body is fresh; and to bury the body before he is sent for, or without sending for him, is a misdemeanor. (d) It is also laid down that if a dead body in prison, or other place, whereupon an inquest ought to be taken, be interred or suffered to lie so long that it putrefy before the coroner has viewed it, the gaoler or township shall be amerced. CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

OF GOING ARMED IN THE NIGHT-TIME FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF GAME, AND OF ASSAULTING GAMEKEEPERS.

BEFORE proceeding to the proper subject of this chapter, it may be well to say a few words as to the property in game, in order to remove doubts which have sometimes been expressed. The law of England has never recognized the very unreasonable doctrine of the Roman law, that any trespasser had a right to the game that he caught or killed on any man's land. (a) It is quite clear that, by the Constitutions of Canute concerning forests, every freeman was entitled to take and dispose of the game on his own land, and that no one had a right to enter on the lands of another for such a purpose. (b) And an examination of the year books and other ancient authorities shows that by the common law the owner of land had a possessory property in the game upon his land, so long as it continued upon that land, and he might maintain an action of trespass against any one who entered upon the land, and killed or took any game thereon and carried it away, and recover damages as well for the trespass as for the value of the game. The property in living game was called possessory, because it depended on the possession of the game by reason of the possession of the land, whereon it was, and as soon as it quitted the land of its own free will the possessory property ceased. But if the game were taken or killed on the land, the property which before was merely possessory became absolute in the owner of the land. Two cases alone need be cited to show how clearly this law was settled. To an action of trespass on a warren and carrying away a pheasant, the defendant pleaded that the pheasant was found on his own land, and he let fly his falcon at it, and the falcon pursued and caught the pheasant in the warren, and the defendant followed and took the pheasant; and it was held that the defendant might lawfully take the pheasant, though he was liable for the entry into the warren. (c) So where C. brought an action of trespass against M. for entering his close and carrying away a dead hart, M. pleaded

(b) The law on this subject is stated in different terms in different authors in consequence of different translations having been made of the original Saxon. 4 Inst. 320. The law may be found, Spelm. Glos. tit. Foresta, p. 242, No. 30. Edit. 1687. 4 Inst. 320. 2 Blac. Com. 414, who cites it as chapter 77, and says that it was the ancient law of the Scandinavian continent, citing Stiernhook de jure Sween. 1. 2, c. 8. Deac. G. L. 40, citing also a license of Canute to the same effect. In 2 Blac. Com. 414, a similar law of Edward the Confessor, chapter 36, is cited. In 4 Inst. 293, a charter of the Empress Maud is cited containing a similar law. From a comparison of these several authorities, the following seems to be substantially correct: Sit quilibet liber homo dignus venatione sua in silva et in agris sibi propriis et in dominio suo, sed abstineat omnis homo a venariis regis.

(c) 38 Edw. 3, 10. The decision in this case is stated according to the statement of Brook, J., in 12 Hen. 8, 10: 'If I let my falcon fly in my own land at a pheasant, and he kills the pheasant in that he was the forester of the Queen of the free chase of B., and that the plaintiff entered the forest and chased a hart out of the forest, and that the defendant as the forester made fresh pursuit after the hart, and the hart was killed on the land of the plaintiff before the defendant came there, and that the defendant seized the hart for the Queen; it was held that this justification was good; for the hart was the property of the owner of the chase, and the plaintiff had done wrong in chasing the hart out of the forest, and it was not reasonable that he should take advantage of his own wrong. (d) It is to be observed that in both these cases the plaintiff claimed the property in the game by reason of its having been killed on his land, and in neither case was any objection made to the declaration. (e) The decisions, therefore, in the Earl of your land, you do not gain any property in the pheasant; but I can take the pheasant, and shall not be punished except for the entry into your land; for it was by my industry and labour, and when my falcon had caught it, it was in my possession.' And see 12 Mod. 145, per Holt, C. J., in the next note; and observe that the pheasant was not started in a warren, &c., but simply on the defendant's own land.

(d) 12 Hen. 8, 9. This is the case relied upon by Holt, C. J., in Sutton v. Moody, 1 Lord Raym. 250. 3 Salk. 290. 2 Salk. 556. Holt. 608. Comb. 458. 12 Mod. R. 145. 5 Mod. R. 375. It is clear that there is a mistake in the reports of Sutton v. Moody as to the obiter dictum of Holt, C. J., that 'if A. starts a hare in the ground of B., and hunts it into the ground of C., and kills it there, the property is in A. the hunter.' There is nothing in the 12 Hen. 8, 9, to support any such dictum; on the contrary, the principle of the decision is directly the other way. For this dictum makes A. derive a benefit from his own wrongful act in hunting the hare out of the land of B.; and it is plain that there is a further mistake, for Holt, C. J., having stated that 'the privilege of warren gives no greater property in the rabbits to the warrener; for the property arises to the party from the possession' of the land, is made to say immediately after the passage above cited, 'if A. starts a hare, &c., in a forest or warren of B., and hunts it into the ground of C., and kills it there, the property remains all the while in B., the proprietor of the warren, because the privilege continues.' So that the judgment is contradictory. But I find in 12 Mod. 145, that the dictum was not delivered until after judgment in the case; for Holt, C. J., says, 'when we gave judgment on this case, I mentioned 12 Hen. 8, 9; and, after stating the point decided, he adds, 'they held also that if a man start game in his own ground, and hunt it into his neighbour's ground and there kill it, yet in regard of his first starting and pursuit, the property is still in him; and it may be inferred from that case that if I start game in one man's ground, and hunt it into another man's ground and there kill it, the property is in me, because the party in whose ground it was started having no privilege, he cannot come and take it.' So that, probably, all Holt, C. J., really said was that it might be contended that such was the law. It has, however, been supposed that this obiter dictum was deliberately sanctioned in Churchward v. Studdy, 14 East. 249. There the plaintiff's bounds put up a hare in a third person's land, and ran it into the defendant's land, where it ran between the legs of a labourer, when one of the dogs caught her and the labourer took her up alive, and the defendant took her from him and killed her, and the labourer swore he took the hare up in aid of the hunters; Chambre, J., acted on the dictum in question, and the plaintiff had a verdict, and a rule for a new trial was obtained 'on the supposition that there was no evidence that the hare had been in any manner reduced into the possession of the plaintiff before it had been taken from the labourer by the defendant; and that the labourer was not to be considered as having taken it up for either of the parties;' but when the report had been read, the counsel in support of the rule admitted that he was not aware that the labourer had proved that he had taken up the hare in aid of the hunters, and the rule was discharged. The dictum, therefore, was not discussed at all in this case, and it rests on the loose reports of Sutton v. Moody; and it is difficult to conceive that so great a judge as Lord Holt could ever have uttered so unreasonable a dictum as that a man, by trespassing on another's land and driving his game out of it, could divest his property in it and vest it in himself—omnia in favorem spoliatoris. See per Littleton, 9 Edw. 4, 35.

(e) It would occupy far too much space to do more than refer to some of the old authorities for the benefit of any one who may have to investigate the subject. They are—8 Ed. 4, 5; 3 Hen. 6, 55; 11 Hen. 6, 34; 10 Hen. 6, 16; 18 Hen. 6, 21; 14 Hen. 8, 2; 18 Hen. 8, 2; 10 Hen. 7, 6, where Keble said, 'as to these deer being by the possession of the land; what Holt, C. J., therefore said on that subject was on the very point in the cause.

(i) It is to be observed that the word 'rabbits' is here omitted; so that if poachers enter for the purpose of taking rabbits, but have not either taken or destroyed any, they have committed no offence within sec. 1, and therefore sec. 2 gives no authority to apprehend them. Section 9 extends to poachers entering with intent to take both game and rabbits, and is, therefore, in this respect, more extensive than sec. 1. See Rex v. Ball, R. & M. C. C. R. 330, post, p. 647.

In consequence of the easy manner in which poachers escaped detection and apprehension by the power to apprehend them being confined to cases where they were found upon the land committing the offence, the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, was passed. Sec. 1, defines game to include one or more hares, pheasants, partridges, eggs of pheasants and partridges, woodcocks, snipes, rabbits, grouse, black or moor game, and eggs of grouse, black or moor game; and sec. 2, makes it lawful for 'any constable or peace officer in any county, borough, or place in Great Britain and Ireland in any highway, street or public place, to search any person whom he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, or any person aiding or abetting such person, and having in his possession any game unlawfully obtained, or any gun, part of a gun, or nets or engines used for the killing or taking game, and also to stop and search any cart or other conveyance in or upon which such constable or peace officer shall have good cause to suspect that any such game or any such article or thing is being carried by any such person, and should there be found any game or any such article or thing as aforesaid upon such person, cart or other conveyance, to seize and detain such game, article or thing;' and the constable or peace officer is in such case to apply for a summons citing such person to appear before two justices in petty sessions, as provided by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 106, s. 9, in England and Ireland, and before a sheriff or any two justices in Scotland, and 'if such person shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, (t) or shall have

(s) This Act seems to have been a manifest mistake in legislation, for there is no reason whatever in point of law why the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, did not include all highways. And Reg. v. Pratt, 4 E. & B. 860, where it was held that a person might be convicted of a trespass in pursuit of game on a highway under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 30, s. 30, is a strong authority to that effect. The law is clear that subject to the right of passage the soil and every right incident to the soil of a highway is in the owner of the soil, and every one who goes on a highway, not in the exercise of the right of way, but for any other purpose is a trespasser. Ibid. See also Mayhew v. Wardley, 8 Law T. 504, where a man, who standing in a highway shot a partridge in a field adjoining, was held to be properly convicted of a trespass in pursuit of game on the highway.

(t) It is not necessary under this clause to prove from what particular land the game was taken. The only question is, whether it was unlawfully taken from any land; and if a man be found in the night with recently killed game or with guns or nets, or with both, the inference may be drawn that he has been on some land without showing what land in the used any such article or thing as aforesaid for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto, such person shall on being convicted thereof forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding five pounds, and shall forfeit the game, guns, parts of guns, nets and engines, and the justices are to direct them to be sold or destroyed, and the proceeds of the sale and penalty to be paid to the treasurer of the county or borough; and if no conviction takes place the game, article, or thing or the value thereof, shall be restored to the person from whom it was seized. Where a bill of indictment had been preferred within a year after the commission of an offence under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, against the prisoner and Robins, and ignored as to the prisoner, but found against Robins, who was convicted, and four years afterwards a fresh bill was found against the prisoner; it was considered to be clear that preferring the first bill was the commencement of a prosecution, but it was doubted whether the condition in sec. 4, requiring a prosecution by indictment to be commenced within twelve calendar months, had been complied with by preferring the bill, which was ignored. And Adam v. The Inhabitants of Bristol (v) was referred to; where, in an action for an injury to property by rioters on the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 31, which requires the action to be commenced within three months, the party had commenced an action within three months and died, and her executor brought an action within forty days after her death, but more than three months after the damage was done, and it was contended that the condition having been once complied with, the executor had a right to bring an action within a reasonable time; but the Court held that the action was not brought in time. Commencement of the prosecution.

On the trial of an indictment for night-poaching, it appeared that the offence was committed on the 12th of January, 1844; the indictment was found at the assizes held on the 1st March, 1845; but the warrant by which the defendant was committed on the present charge was on the 11th of December, 1844; and Pollock, C. B., held that the warrant of commitment must be taken to show the commencement of the prosecution, and therefore the prosecution was shown to have been commenced within twelve calendar months after the commission of the offence. information and proceedings before the magistrate, and not the preferring the bill, was the commencement of the proceedings, and that a variance between the manner of laying the offence in the indictment and charging it in the commitment made no difference. See also Rex v. Phillips, R. & R. 369, where it was held that proof by parol that the prisoner was apprehended for treason respecting the coin, within the three months limited by the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, was not sufficient if the indictment was after the three months, and the warrant to apprehend or commit, or depositions were not produced to show on what transactions, or for what offence, or at what time the prisoners were committed.

Information.

Upon an indictment for night-poaching under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, laying an information before a magistrate is the commencement of the prosecution. The offence was committed on the 4th of December 1845. The information before the magistrates and warrant were on the 19th of the same month. One prisoner was apprehended and committed on the 5th of September, 1846; the other on the 21st of October in the same year: the indictment was preferred on the 5th of April, 1847; and, upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that the prosecution was commenced in time. (y)

Warrant to apprehend.

But where on the trial of an indictment for night-poaching it appeared that the offence was committed some time in 1853, and a warrant for the defendant's apprehension granted at that time, but not served, the defendant having absconded, and on the defendant's return after six years' absence, the present proceedings were instituted and the preceding cases were cited; Pollock, C.B., said, 'None of these cases go to the extent contended for in this case. I am of opinion that the issuing of this warrant was not a commencement of proceedings within the statute,' and the prisoner was accordingly acquitted. (z)

Tame game is not within the Act.

On an indictment for night-poaching it appeared that some tame pheasants were in coops about 150 yards from a house; but they were not shut up, and could run about, and on this night they were roosting in trees close by. Common hens were in the coops, having been used for rearing the pheasants. The prisoners went to the coops, and one said, 'There is nothing here but an old hen;' they were looking in other coops when they were apprehended. It was held that these birds could not be considered game within the meaning of the statute. As long as they were under the charge of the hen, as long as she was their guardian, and while they were about her, and running about with her, he who took them was guilty of larceny. (a)

Indictment upon sec. 1, for a third offence.

An indictment alleged that the prisoner was duly convicted before three justices, for that he by night after the expiration of the first hour after sunset and before the beginning of the first hour before sunrise, did by night unlawfully enter a certain close, &c., describing it, with a gun for the purpose of then and there taking and destroying game; and the prisoner was thereupon adjudged for his said offence, the same being his first offence, to be imprisoned, &c.; and that the prisoner afterwards was duly convicted before two justices, for that he by night unlawfully did enter and be in certain inclosed land, &c., describing it, 'with certain instruments for the purpose of killing, taking, and destroying game thereon, this being his second offence;' and was thereupon adjudged, &c. It was objected on error: 1. That the second conviction alleged was not valid, because the first conviction

(z) Reg. v. Hull, 2 F. & F. 16. This case is so badly reported, that it is impossible to see what was really decided. If the last proceedings had no connection with the warrant, or information on which it issued, that may have been the ground of the decision. See Rex v. Killminster, supra.

(a) Reg. v. Garnham, 8 Cox C. C. 451, Pollock, C. B., and Williams, J. Pollock, C. B., also said, 'I take it if a man go into a London market, and buy pheasants' eggs, and hatch them under a common hen, when the birds became free from control they would come under the game laws.'

tion did not appear to have been set out in it; but it was held that all that was necessary in such an indictment in order to give the Court jurisdiction was to show that there had been two former convictions under the statute, and that was shown here. 2. It was objected, that the second conviction only said that the prisoner entered 'with certain instruments,' not specifying what they were, or even that they were used for the purpose of killing game; but it was held that, as it was alleged that the offence was committed by night in the land with instruments for the purpose of taking and destroying game, the latter words being applicable to the instruments as well as to the presence of the party, got rid of all the difficulty. 3. It was objected, that the second conviction did not allege that the prisoner entered for the purpose of taking game 'by night,' and that the first conviction did not allege that the act was done by night on the particular close; but it was held that the expression 'by night' preceding the whole clause quite cured the difficulty as to time. Lastly, it was objected, that the first conviction was 'the first hour before sunrise,' instead of 'last hour before sunrise,' and that this was impossible; but the objection was overruled. (b)

An indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, for a third offence set out the previous convictions, one of which alleged that the prisoner 'entered into certain inclosed land in the parish of A. B. for the purpose of taking and destroying game in the night,' and Maule, J., held that the indictment was bad for not alleging the entry by night. (c)

Although three or more poachers are out by night armed, and are guilty of an offence within sec. 9, still they are liable to be apprehended under sec. 2, as they are guilty of an offence under sec. 1, as well as under sec. 9. (d) If persons are found actually in the commission of an offence against sec. 1, they may be apprehended by the persons authorized to apprehend by sec. 2, although no notice be given to them of the cause for which they are apprehended; for the circumstances constitute sufficient notice. (e) And it is not necessary that there should be a written authority; it is sufficient if the party were employed as a watcher of game preserves by the lord of the manor. (f) And although the persons mentioned in sec. 2 have no authority to apprehend unless the poachers are found upon the manor or land of the persons therein specified; (g) yet if a poacher be found on the manor by

(b) Cureton v. The Queen, 1 B. & S. 208. In Fletcher v. Calthrop, 6 Q. B. 880, a conviction which alleged that the defendant entered certain inclosed land by night 'with a net for the purpose of taking game, to wit, partridges and pheasants,' was held bad, because it did not state the intent to take the game there. This decision has always appeared to be questionable, and in Cureton v. The Queen, Cockburn, C. J., and Hill, J., strongly expressed their doubts as to its correctness. It seems clear that a man does not enter a close with intent to take game unless it be to take game in that close, but he enters it for some other purpose, e.g. to cross it and kill game in another close. If a man gets into a railway carriage in London on his way to his moors in Scotland, can it be said that he enters the carriage with intent to kill grouse?

a servant of the lord, and run off it, but being pursued return upon it again, the servant may apprehend him, for it is the same as if he had never been off the manor. (h) Where a wood was neither the property of the master of an assistant gamekeeper, nor in his occupation, nor within any manor which belonged to him, and he had only the permission of the owner to preserve the game there, it was held that the assistant gamekeeper had no authority to apprehend poachers in the wood. (i) So the gamekeeper of a person who rents the shooting over land has no right to apprehend a poacher; for a person who rents the shooting is neither the owner nor the occupier of the land. (k) Unless a poacher be found in pursuit of game between the expiration of the first hour after sunset and the beginning of the last hour before sunrise, there is no power to apprehend him under sec. 2. In consequence of the many cases which had occurred in which questions had arisen as to the right to apprehend persons committing offences in the night, and especially in poaching cases, (m) the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11, was framed. (n) It recites that 'doubts have been entertained as to the authority to apprehend persons found committing indictable offences in the night,' and enacts that 'it shall be lawful for any person whatsoever to apprehend any person, who shall be found committing any indictable offence in the night, and to convey him or deliver him to some constable or

(l) Rex v. Tomlinson, 7 C. & P. 183, Coleridge, J. See the case, post, tit. Man-slaughter, Resisting Officers. By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17 (which will be found in vol. 2), any person in the day-time taking or killing any hare or coney in any warren, or ground lawfully used for the breeding or keeping of hares or conies, or at any time setting or using therein any snare or engine for the taking of hares or conies, is subjected to a penalty of not exceeding £5; and by sec. 103 may, if found committing the offence, be immediately apprehended without a warrant by any peace officer, or by the owner of the property, on or with respect to which the offence is committed, or by his servant, or any person authorized by him. This power only applies to hares and conies, and to the places specified. By the Game Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 31, any person found on any land, &c., in search or pursuit of game, woodcocks, snipes, quails, land-rails, or conies, may be required by any person having the right of killing game upon such land, or by the occupier or gamekeeper, or servant of either of them, or by the warden, &c., of any forest, &c., forthwith to quit the land whereon he is found, and to tell his christian and surname, and place of abode; and if such person, after being so required, refuse to tell his real name or place of abode, or give such a general description of his place of abode as shall be illusory for the purpose of discovery, or wilfully continue or return upon the land, he may be apprehended by the party so requiring, or by any person acting by his order and in his aid, and conveyed as soon as conveniently may be before a magistrate. In order to justify the apprehension of an offender under this section he must have been required both to quit the land, and also to tell his name; and the return must be upon the same land as the party was found upon, and for the same purpose, that is, in search or pursuit of game, &c.; for otherwise a man going along a public path over the same land would come within the section. *Rex v. (n) It was my clause. C. S. G.

other peace officer, in order to his being conveyed, as soon as conveniently may be, before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law.'

It is to be observed that this clause only applies to the apprehension of persons committing indictable offences; whilst, therefore, it authorizes the apprehension of any persons committing an offence under sec. 9, it does not authorize the apprehension of any person committing an offence under sec. 1; for that section only creates summary offences, except indeed in the case of a third offence after two previous convictions.

Construction of the Act.

It is proper also to add, that 'night,' as used in sec. 11 of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, is not defined by sec. 13 of that Act; for that section only defines 'the time at which the night shall commence and conclude in any offence against the provisions of this Act;' and sec. 11, neither creates nor mentions any offence, but simply authorizes the apprehension for any indictable offence committed in the night, whether that offence be an offence at common law or created by statute; and consequently the time, with reference to this section, at which night begins and ends in each case will depend on the common law or the statute applicable to the offence, and in night-poaching the time is fixed by 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 12. (o)

Where on an indictment for murder of a gamekeeper in a conflict with more than three poachers, who were out together in pursuit of game about eleven o'clock at night, there was no sufficient evidence of any authority in the keeper to apprehend under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2; Willes, J., held that they were liable to be apprehended by any one under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11; for that section applied to all persons whatever found committing indictable offences in the night, and as more than three persons were found together armed in the field for the purpose of taking game in the night, they were guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to be apprehended for it under that section. (p)

Poachers committing an offence within sec. 9 may be apprehended by any one.

An indictment for assaulting a gamekeeper must either state expressly that the defendant was 'found committing' an offence within sec. 1, or after stating that the defendant entered by night for the purpose of taking game, so as to show that he had committed an offence within that section, must, in the subsequent part so refer to the previous part as to show that he was found committing such offence; and it is not sufficient to state that the defendant entered by night into land for the purpose of taking game, and that he was then and there by night as aforesaid found. A count alleged that the defendants by night did unlawfully enter certain land armed with guns for the purpose of taking game, and that they 'were then and there in the said land by night as aforesaid by one W. R., the servant of Earl B., found, and that the defendants with the guns aforesaid did then and there assault, &c., the said W. R., the said W. R. being then and there authorized to apprehend the defendants;' it was objected that the count was bad, as it neither stated, in the words of the Act, that the defendants sel in Reg. v. Sanderson, infra, and elsewhere.

An indictment for assaulting a gamekeeper must show that the defendant was found committing an offence under sec. 1.

were found committing the offence, nor sufficiently referred to the previous averments to incorporate them in the latter part of it, and the judgment was arrested upon this objection. (q)

Where a count alleged that three entered a close by night with guns for the purpose of taking game, and were found by a servant of the owner of the said close, and that they assaulted him with the said guns; it was objected that this count intended to allege that the prisoners had committed an offence under sec. 9, and therefore the count was bad for not alleging that the prisoners were armed; Patteson, J., asked what answer there was to the objection, and the counsel for the prosecution admitted the force of the objection, and abandoned the count. (r)

The poachers must be 'found upon the land.'

Upon an indictment for wounding with intent to murder a gamekeeper of a nobleman, it appeared that a turnpike-road ran through his estate upon which the game was extensively preserved; but other proprietors preserved game upon lands which were not more than half a mile distant from the place where the wound was given. The keepers swore that they heard shots fired at night in the preserves in quick succession, as if two or more persons were shooting, and suspecting that the parties would shortly pass along the turnpike road, the keepers went and secreted themselves at the road-side. Shortly afterwards, six men came along the road; they had gun-barrels, which they took from their pockets; and an affray took place, in which the keeper was wounded. Several pheasants were found on the road after the affray was over. Wightman, J., told the jury that the keepers were not justified in endeavouring to apprehend the poachers; as they were not found upon any land committing any offence against the game laws, nor was any pursuit made. (s)

The assault must be committed whilst the keepers are attempting to apprehend.

Where on an indictment for assaulting a gamekeeper, the prisoners were proved to have been on land in pursuit of game in the night, and on seeing the keepers made off into a highway, and sat down under a tree, and the keepers went up to them, and were violently assaulted, but the keepers said that they had not followed them with intent to apprehend them; it was held that the assault must be committed at the time when the keepers are attempting to apprehend the poachers, and therefore the prisoners must be acquitted. (t)

Authority of keeper to apprehend.

Upon an indictment for wounding with intent to prevent their lawful apprehension, it appeared that the two prisoners were

Two other objections were intended to be made: first, that the assault was not alleged to have been upon the land where the defendants were found; secondly, that there was no averment to show that the keeper was in the execution of his duty when the assault was committed, and unless that were the case the assault was not within this Act. See Rex v. Cheere, 4 B. & C. 902, ante, p. 638. C. S. G.

the second section, and that only requires the offenders to be found on the close 'committing any such offence,' as is mentioned in the first section, i. e. entering 'with any gun,' &c. It is clear that the count would have been bad if it had alleged the offence in the terms of the ninth section, unless those terms were equivalent to those creating the offence in the first section; and as the count alleged the offence in the terms of the first section, it was clearly good.

seized while poaching in the night on a preserve which had belonged to the Earl of Lichfield, and was then in the possession of his trustees, and the head-keeper had been appointed by Lord Lichfield twenty years before, and regularly paid by Lord Lichfield's agent to the time in question, but had never had any direct communication with the trustees, and a watcher, appointed by the head-keeper, had been wounded by the prisoners whilst apprehending them, and it was held that the evidence of authority was sufficient. (u)

So where a covert was the property of Sir John Acton, an infant, and Lord Granville had married Sir John's mother, and had exercised the right of killing and preserving game on Sir John Acton's property for seven years, and had appointed a gamekeeper; it was held that this was sufficient prima facie evidence of his right under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 36, to demand and take game from a person found in the covert. (v)

The ninth section creates two distinct offences, namely, first entering on land, one of the party being armed; and secondly, being on the land armed. (w)

Sec. 9 creates two offences.

By the express words of sec. 9, if several are together, and any one of them is armed, all of them are liable to be convicted; and it was so held on the 57 Geo. 3, c. 90, the words of which were 'if any person or persons,' &c., 'shall be found,' &c., 'armed with any gun,' &c. O'Flannagan and two others were in a park at night, and two of them had guns: O'Flannagan had one, but which of the other two persons had the other gun could not be ascertained; the point was therefore saved, whether either of these two could be found guilty; but, upon a case reserved, the judges were clear that, if any one of the party was armed, every one of the party was within the Act. (x) But it was held, on the same repealed statute, that if several were out together, and one had arms without the knowledge of the others, the others were not liable to be convicted. Johnson and Southern went into a close in the night to kill game; Johnson had a loaded pistol, but Southern did not know it: and, upon a case reserved, the judges thought Southern not liable to be convicted under the Act. (y)

Of the being armed.

One being armed is sufficient.

Not so if the others are ignorant that he is armed.

A constructive arming was held not to be sufficient within the new statute; if therefore an indictment allege that two defendants, together with another person, entered a close, the two defendants being armed, and it appear that the two defendants were unarmed, they must be acquitted. An indictment stated that Davis and Griffiths, together with another person, entered certain land, 'the said Davis and Griffiths then and there being armed:' it was proved that the third person had a gun, but Davis and Griffiths were unarmed; it was held that Davis and Griffiths must be acquitted; for under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, a constructive arming is not sufficient, and as the indictment stated that these two men were armed, and the proof was that neither of them was so, the allegation was not proved, and the case therefore failed. (z)

three are in a close all need not be armed.

But where an indictment for night-poaching charged eight prisoners with 'being respectively armed with guns and other offensive weapons,' and the jury found that two of the prisoners were armed with guns and the rest with bludgeons; it was objected, that a merely constructive arming was not sufficient under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, and that every prisoner not armed with a gun was entitled to be acquitted, and that no reliance could be placed on the words, 'and other offensive weapons,' for that the statute enumerating by name gun, crossbow, firearms, and bludgeons, and adding 'or any other offensive weapons,' the indictment ought to have specified the offensive weapon in any case, and particularly where the weapon was one of those named in the statute; Coleridge, J., overruled the objection, and upon a case reserved, the judges were of opinion that the conviction was right, and overruled Reg. v. Davis. (a) offensive weapons within

Large stones are offensive weapons, if they are of a description capable of occasioning serious injury, and if they are brought and used for that purpose. The defendants had brought with them from a distance some large heavy smooth stones, and had thrown them at a gamekeeper and his assistants, whereby they had been struck and knocked down; it was left to the jury to say, whether the stones had been brought by the defendants to the place or found upon the spot; whether they were of such a description as to be capable of occasioning serious injury to the person if used offensively; and whether they were brought and used for that purpose; for that, if they were satisfied of the affirmative of all those questions, these stones were offensive weapons within the statute. (b) Where a stick or other instrument, ordinarily used for the purpose of walking, is found in the possession of poachers, it is a question for the jury, whether such stick or other instrument was taken out for the purpose of being used as an offensive weapon, for if it was taken out for such purpose it is an offensive weapon within the statute. The prisoner had taken with him when poaching a thick stick, large enough to be called a bludgeon, but which, being lame, he was in the habit of using as a crutch; it was held to be a question for the jury, whether he took it out with intent to use it as an offensive weapon, or merely for the purpose to which he usually applied it. (c) So where the only weapons proved to have been used by the prisoners were sticks, and one, with which a gamekeeper had been knocked down, when produced, proved to be a very small one, fairly answering the description of a common walking-stick; and on its being objected that this stick could not be considered an offensive weapon, it was answered that the use made of it by the prisoner showed his intention, and the nature of the stick; Gurney, B., said, that if a man went out with a common walking-stick, and there were circumstances to show that he intended to use it for purposes of offence, it might perhaps be called an offensive weapon within the statute; but if he had it in the ordinary way, and upon some unexpected attack or collision he was provoked to use it in his own defence, it would be carrying the statute somewhat too far to say it was an offensive weapon within the meaning of the Act. (d) Where the prisoners were found in a field with nets, hares, and dogs, and putting the hares on sticks walked off, and the sticks were about four feet and a half long, and about one and a half inch in diameter, one of them being weighted with an iron ferule, and another had a large knot at the thick end; Rolfe, B., directed the jury that if the prisoners brought the sticks merely and exclusively for the purpose of carrying hares, then they were not armed within the Act, though it was possible that the sticks might have been very effectively used as offensive weapons in any affray with the keepers. But if the jury thought that the prisoners took the sticks for the double purpose of staking the nets or carrying away the game, and also of attacking the keepers, if occasion should arise for such a purpose, then they would be armed within the Act. (e) So where an indictment on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, alleged that the prisoners were armed with bludgeons and other offensive weapons; and it was proved that all of them had sticks, and that one of them used his stick against a keeper, Rex v. Johnson (f) was cited to show that a stick used for offensive purposes was an offensive weapon; and Maule, J., observed that in that case the stick was capable of being an offensive weapon; but here there was no evidence as to the size or length; and left it to the jury to determine whether this stick was an 'offensive weapon.' (g)

Under the repealed statute it was held that perceiving a person fire was finding him armed, though his person was not seen at the time: and it was no answer to a charge under that Act that the parties put down their arms, and left them before they were seen, if it was perceived that some one was there armed before they were seen. A keeper heard a gun fired in a wood, and called to his man to watch: the persons in the wood immediately abandoned their guns, and had crept away two hundred yards from them, when the keeper and his man discovered and seized them. A case was reserved upon the question, whether they could be considered as found armed when they had got to so great a distance from their guns before they were discovered: and the judges (eleven) held that they were, and that they were rightly convicted. (h)

So it was sufficient under the repealed statute, if the evidence satisfied the jury that the prisoner had been in the place named in the indictment for the purpose of destroying game. Upon an indictment, which charged the prisoner in every count with having entered a wood, called Kingshoe Spinney, it was proved that a gamekeeper heard nine reports, and saw three flashes in the wood: the prisoner was not seen in the wood, but was soon afterwards seen in a close which adjoined the wood: upon this evidence it was left to the jury to say, whether the prisoner was one of the party in the wood; and they having found that he was, the judges, upon a case reserved, held that, as there was evidence to satisfy the jury that he had been in the wood armed, or was one of a party who had been so, it was sufficient. (i)

So it is not necessary under the new Act that the defendants should be actually seen in the close laid in the indictment; it is sufficient if there be evidence to satisfy the jury that they were in fact in the close for the purpose alleged. Thus where the prisoners had been seen in a close which lay between two woods, going in a direction from one of the woods, in which shots had been previously heard, towards the other wood, it was left to the jury to say whether they had not been in the wood in which the shots had been heard. (k)

As to whether three must enter the land, or whether an entry by one in the presence of others is sufficient.

A difference of opinion exists as to whether all the three defendants must be proved to have been in the close laid in the indictment, or whether it is sufficient to prove that all were out for the common purpose of taking game, and that one entered the close, two more being near enough to the close to aid and assist. Where it appeared that Dowsell alone was seen in Rodborough Hill Brake, the place laid in the indictment, between which and Rodborough Wood a turnpike road ran, and at that time no one was in company with Dowsell, and he escaped out of the brake into the road, where he was seized by a keeper, and whistled loudly, upon which four more men came out of Rodborough Wood, and rescued Dowsell: shots had been heard in the direction of the brake and the wood, but the witnesses were unable to speak as to which place the shots were fired in: it was objected, that there was no evidence to show that any one except Dowsell was in the brake; and unless it appeared that three were together in the place specified, no offence was proved: and Patteson, J., held that in order to support this indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, it must be proved that the prisoners were all together in the place laid in the indictment, and as that was not shown, that the prisoners must be acquitted. (l) But where an accomplice proved that all the four defendants went to a preserve called Norton Hill Wood for the purpose of killing pheasants, and that all of them, except himself and Meadows, went into the wood, they remaining outside; and on the approach of the game-keepers the witness and Meadows went into the wood, and informed the others of it, when they all ran away together; Alderson, B., said, 'the entering on the land by one is to be considered as the entering of all, if the others are at the place and

The second and third counts stated the prisoner to have been found in Kingshoe Close, which adjoined the wood, and a question was raised upon these counts, but not decided, viz., whether it was necessary that the prisoner should be found armed in the same close, into which he entered for the purpose of killing game?

assisting—exactly in the same way that would fix them in a case of burglary; there all are guilty, as well those who actually enter the house as those who are close at hand on the outside of it, waiting to watch or to carry off the property: it is enough if all these persons were at the place, each of them acting his part, and conducting to one common intent, although some only of the party were bodily in the wood.’ (m) And in another case, where one or two out of four poachers were not actually in the wood laid in the indictment, but were waiting outside to watch, the same very learned Judge said, ‘if two persons were in the wood, and the other two outside were of the same party, and there for the same purpose, it would be an offence within the Act. Suppose that some of the party were to go down one side of the hedge, and some down the other, beating the same fence, that would be no offence within the statute, according to Rex v. Dowdell; (n) and the same consequence would follow if two went into the wood, and a number of others surrounded the outside: surely the statute meant to include such cases: I have a strong opinion on the point; but out of respect for my brother Patteson’s opinion, if the question arises, I will reserve the point.’ (o)

(m) Rex v. Passey, 7 C. & P. 282.

(o) Rex v. Lockett, 7 C. & P. 300, Alderson, B. The jury having found that all the defendants had entered the wood, the question was not reserved. In Rex v. Andrews, 2 M. & Rob. 37, Gurney, B., is reported to have expressed a similar opinion, though it was not necessary for the decision of the case; but as the learned Baron, in a case at Stafford Spring Assizes, 1841, in which the same point arose, expressed great doubts on it, and would have reserved the point if the jury had convicted, the opinion expressed in Rex v. Andrews cannot be considered as being the deliberate opinion of the learned Baron. This question may be considered under two states of facts: first, where less than three enter the land, the others being near enough to aid and assist; secondly, where three enter and others are near enough to aid and assist. First, as to the case where less than three enter, this is quite as much a question of whether an offence within sec. 9 has been committed, as whether those who have not entered the field are guilty of such offence; and it is submitted that, whether we look at the object or the words of the clause, there must be an actual bodily entry by three persons into the close to bring the case within sec. 9. The object of the clause was to protect keepers from violence; now it is obvious that if less than three be in the close there is less danger of violence than if three be in it; if three be in the close they are ready to assist each other in committing violence; if some be out of the close, they must get into the close before they are in a position to commit it, and in some cases this might be impracticable; thus in the case put by the very learned Baron of part going down one side of a hedge, and part down the other, the hedge might be so strong that the one part could not get through it to assist the other in an attack upon keepers: and many similar cases might be put. As to the words, they seem strongly to indicate that there must be an entry by all three, and all three ‘together;’ the word ‘together’ is very important: if three poachers went to a wood of very large size, and each entered it separately at far distant points, they would have been within the clause if the word ‘together’ had been omitted. Again, the words are, ‘any of such persons being armed.’ Suppose that the one that entered was not armed, but that one of the others was, then if it were held that the offence was complete, it would be so holding, although no person armed had entered the land; if it were held necessary that the one who entered should be armed, it would be limiting the arming to one particular individual, instead of leaving it indefinite which was armed. Difficulties would also arise from holding the entry of one to be the entry of all. Suppose three poachers went out with the common design of taking game in a narrow plantation, and the fields on each side of it, and that one went up the plantation, and one up each adjacent field, all being near enough to assist in killing game; according to such a construction each would be guilty of three distinct offences; in other words, all three would be together in three different closes uno eodemque tempore. The instance of burglary is not analogous, because that offence does not consist in an entry by ‘three or more together,’ but by one person; as soon, therefore, as an entry by one is shown, the crime is proved, and then the question is, whether others engaged in the same transaction were principals in the

Where three poachers go out with a common purpose, but afterwards separate in pursuit of game in different fields, they are not guilty of an offence within sec. 9. The three defendants went out for the purpose of night-poaching: Powell and Owen were seen setting nets in the hedge-row of the yew tree piece, they being on the other side in a turnpike road, and Nickless went into another field; Powell and Owen sent a dog into the yew tree piece, which drove a hare into one of the nets; it was second degree or accessories. Here the question is whether the crime has been committed. In burglary, and indeed in most, if not all, common law offences, where several persons are present at the commission of a crime, the indictment may either state the facts according to their legal effect, i. e. that all committed the act; or as they occurred, i. e. that one did the act, and that the others were present aiding and assisting. If, therefore, the case of burglary were analogous, an indictment alleging that one entered the field, and that the others were present aiding and assisting, ought to be good, and yet it is conceived no such indictment could be so framed as to give effect either to the word 'together,' or to the indefiniteness of the words 'any of such persons being armed.' It is to be observed, also, that sec. 2 only authorizes the apprehension of those who are 'found upon any land,' so that the persons not in the field could not be apprehended under that section. The Game Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 32, which applies to 'any persons to the number of five or more together, found upon any land,' may also be referred to as showing that there must be an entry by all; for how could it be said that finding one person in a field, with four in the adjoining field, was finding five together in the field where the one was found? On the whole it is submitted, that unless there has been a bodily entry by three together the offence is not complete.

Secondly, where three have bodily entered into the close, and others are near aiding and assisting; here the crime is assumed to be complete, and the question is, whether those near are guilty of it within sec. 9. If the common law rule, by which all are principals in misdemeanors (see note (b) ante, p. 128) prevailed, not only those near enough to assist, but all who were parties to the transaction, although absent, would be guilty; but it seems admitted on all hands that the common law rule does not apply; indeed Alderson, B. could only have referred to the analogy of burglary in Rex v. Passey, because he thought the common law rule did not apply. Some limit, then, must be put upon the clause, and it is submitted that the correct limit is to confine it to the persons who actually enter the close. The intent with which the parties enter being the same (with the slight difference pointed out in note (i), ante, p. 641) in both sec. 1 and sec. 9; sec. 9 rather authorizes a heavier punishment than introduces a new offence, and the two sections may well be read together thus: if any persons, whether one or more, enter, &c., they shall be liable to the punishment in sec. 1; but if three or more enter together armed, they shall be liable to the punishment in sec. 9, and the heavier punishment of that section may well be confined to those who actually enter the close. The clause requires both an entry and an arming, and as an entry by any number, however large, if unarmed, will not be sufficient; so it is but reasonable that a presence without an entry should not be sufficient; and as the statute has made an arming by one sufficient, if it had been intended that an entry by part should enure as an entry by all, probably it would have been made so by express words.

With regard to the entry, it is submitted that the statute intended an actual bodily entry into the close, and not such an entry as would amount to a trespass at common law. The doctrine in burglary that if any part of the person be introduced into the house, it is a sufficient entry, has long been considered as going a great length, and it would be carrying it much further to apply it to this offence. Sec. 2 also seems to show that an entry of the whole person was intended: it provides that 'where any person shall be found upon any land, he may be apprehended upon such land,' or in case of escape 'therefrom;' now, how can it be said that a person who merely introduces his hand into one field while standing in another comes within this clause? The Game Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, ss. 31, 32, affords a similar argument. Suppose three poachers went, with intent to take game, to a park wall, too high for them to get over, and one, in the presence of the others, introduced his hand through a hole left for hares at the bottom of the wall, and set a snare within the park, could it be fairly contended that this was an entry by all armed into the park within sec. 9?

On the whole it is submitted that Mr. J. Patteson's construction of the statute is correct, and that there must be an entry of the whole person by three persons into the close to bring the case within sec. 9, and that none are within that section except those who actually enter the close. C. S. G.

held that the case was not within the statute, as Nickless was independently engaged in poaching in the field, he having left the others poaching in the road. (p)

Upon an indictment against six prisoners for night-poaching in Ratcliffe's field, it appeared that the prisoners were in company in a lane adjoining the field in question setting nets between the ditch and the hedge of the field to take game. One of them remained with the nets, and the rest divided into two parties, and went round the field. Three or four of the prisoners armed with bludgeons were seen at one time beating in the field, with two dogs, for game. A witness stated that he saw all the prisoners come out of the field, and go together to the nets and take them up. The prisoners were all associated and engaged in the common purpose of taking game in the field in question. The prisoners were pursued and apprehended, and four of them had sticks or bludgeons, and two of them drew knives from their pockets, and threatened to stab the takers. It was objected that the evidence did not sufficiently prove that all the prisoners had been in the field, and that none could be properly convicted, who had not been in the field, and as those who had been in the field could not be identified, all must be acquitted. Wilde, C. J., did not think the evidence sufficiently certain that all had been in the field, and directed the jury to consider whether all the prisoners were at the time associated and engaged in the common purpose of taking game by some of them going armed into the field, and there beating for game, while others rendered their aid by remaining outside the hedge; and directed the jury that if they were satisfied that all the prisoners were so engaged, they were all liable to be found guilty, although the witness could not identify which of the prisoners entered the field. The case was left to the jury on the assumption that some of the prisoners never entered the field. The jury found the prisoners guilty, and upon a case reserved the conviction was held right. The judges in this case did not think it necessary to decide, whether it would be an offence within the statute if a party of three or more together, one being armed, entered and were* in land consisting of two or more enclosures in the same or different occupations, because here the indictment made it essential to prove that the offence was committed in the field occupied by Ratcliffe. Five of the judges (q) were of opinion that to constitute the statutable misdemeanor the party must enter into and be bodily in the close, and that if three were in the close and three out the latter were not guilty: and as the three who entered in this case could not be ascertained, all were entitled to be acquitted. Seven of the judges (r) thought that if three were in the close, one being armed, they were guilty, and that all others who were together with them aiding and assisting were guilty of the same misdemeanor, though they were not in the field. (s)

If three of a party enter a field, any one of them being armed for the purpose of poaching, and others are near enough to be aiding and assisting, though not in the same field, all are guilty, if they are all united in the common design of poaching.

(s) Reg. v. Whittaker, 1 Den. C. C. 310; 2 C. & K. 636. Notwithstanding this decision, the Editor adheres to the opinion expressed in his note to the last edition. The fallacy, on which the opinion of the majority of the judges proceeded in this case, lies in applying the principle appli-

This decision was anything but satisfactory, and where an indictment charged the prisoners with night-poaching in Oakley Coppice, and it appeared that the gamekeeper saw three men coming along a field within a few yards of the coppice, and as though coming from it, after he had heard a shot in the direction of the coppice; and a struggle ensued, and pheasants recently killed were found near the spot; it was objected that there was no proof that all the three men entered the coppice; and Patteson, J., said he was entirely of opinion that three men must have actually entered the coppice in order to constitute this offence. He entirely concurred in the views expressed in the note to 'Russell on Crimes.'^(t) Indeed if the constructive presence were alone sufficient, it would follow that if three men went out to poach, and each entered on a separate piece of land, each of the three would be in three different places at the same time; a conclusion which was utterly absurd. (u)

Where three or more poachers enter into several closes, they are guilty of the offence created by sec. 9, if they have the common intent to take game and are of the same party.

On an indictment on sec. 9, it appeared that three persons went out together armed with guns in the night to destroy game, and were together in one of the closes mentioned in the indictment, called Thirteen Acres, but not for the purpose of killing game in that close (for there was none there), nor in one adjoining close by shooting from it. They were passing along it to another place. One at least of the three was in a close mentioned in the indictment, called The Spring, which had pheasants in it, for the purpose of destroying game in that close, but the whole three were not; they were all, however, at that time of the same company, and with that common purpose. The fourth count stated that the prisoners were in enclosed land occupied by C. White. The Spring and the Thirteen Acres were both enclosed and contiguous, being only separated by a fence, and both in the occupation of C. White. There was a question whether this could make any difference, Parke, B., therefore respite the judgment, and reserved the case for the opinion of the judges, and the following judgments were given: Lord Campbell, C. J., 'The fourth count of the indictment alleges that the prisoners were in enclosed land occupied by C. White; and on that count at all events I think the conviction was right and ought to be affirmed. Some confusion seems to have arisen on this matter from not attending sufficiently to the provisions of the Act. It has been treated as though the word, close, occurred in the Act, whereas it only specifies any land open or inclosed; a practice has consequently prevailed of naming a certain close in the indictment, which is quite needless. It would certainly be requisite to designate some land, and give it some description; but if that land comprehended fifty closes, and the offence was committed on any part of such land, it would be within the statute. If therefore A., B., and C. all belonged to one party with one common intent, A. might be in Blackacre, cable to a common law felony to this particular misdemeanor. In misdemeanor all who take part are principals, or only those who fall within the special terms of an enactment. Either, therefore, all who take any part in night-poaching, though 100 miles off, are guilty, or only those who bodily enter the field. See Rex v.

Fletcher, 2 Str. 1166, cited 1 Den. C. C. 384. The marginal note in D. C. C. R. is incorrect—'some' should be 'three.'

B. in Whiteacre, and C. in Greenacre, and all guilty under this statute.' Parke, B.: 'I am of the same opinion; though, at one time, I felt some doubt whether there could be a conviction on any count, I now think there may on the fourth. If the three are all of one party, one or more being armed with an offensive weapon, and with the common object of destroying game in the night, it is immaterial whether they are in the same or in different closes or enclosures. It is necessary to describe the land correctly in the indictment, for the purpose of identifying it; but if the three are on the land so described together under the circumstances I have mentioned, it is sufficient to bring them within the statute, whether the land be open or enclosed, or in one or more enclosures or in one or several occupations. In Mr. Greaves' very able note (a) the reasoning appears to me to be founded on the assumption that the statute provided only for the case of three being together in one and the same piece of enclosed land, if the land was enclosed, or one and the same piece of open land, if it was open, whereas the statute contains no such provision.' Alderson, B.: 'The indictment charges the prisoners with entering, &c., certain land, &c.; it is, therefore, necessary to describe the land, the entering which constitutes the offence charged. The land may consist of different closes, and be in different occupations; but whatever be the number of closes, or of occupations, the land in question must be rightly described in the indictment.' (v) Reg. v. Uzzell, 2 Den. C. C. 274, Talfourd, J., and Platt, B., concurred. This case was not argued, and therefore is entitled to much less weight than it otherwise would have been. The first remark on it is that Reg. v. Whittaker was clearly abandoned as wholly untenable. Then is this case rightly decided? and, with all deference, it is confidently submitted that the decision is erroneous. Sec. 1 enacts that if 'any person' shall 'enter or be in any land whether open or enclosed.' Now, as it cannot be supposed that the Legislature contemplated the case of a person being in two closes or pieces of land at one and the same time, it is clear that 'land' here means one close or piece of land, and the same term in sec. 9 ought to be construed in the same sense also; and that is the true sense of the word; for though land be nomen generalissimum as including all mines, &c., it is quite unusual to speak of several closes even in the occupation of the same person as 'land;' the general, if not invariable, custom being to use 'lands;' and an instance of any number of different fields being spoken of as 'land' when they were in the occupation of different persons would indeed be extraordinary. The repealed Act, 57 Geo. 3, c. 90, had the words 'forest, chase, park, wood, plantation, close, or other open or enclosed ground,' and there can be no doubt that the offence under it was confined to a single close or ground; and it is obvious that the change to 'land' in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, was merely for the purpose of using one term applicable to every kind of land included in the profuse verbiage of the old Act, and not for the purpose of altering the locality of the offence; and as 'open or enclosed ground' in that Act plainly meant either one or the other, but not both, so it does in the new Act also; and therefore the words 'land whether open or enclosed,' are precisely the same as 'open or enclosed land,' and the offence is created as to either, but not as to both. Again, this decision wholly overlooks the word 'together.' How three or more persons, who enter three or more different closes separated by hedges, even if they adjoin each other (and the judgment in this case does not limit the decision to such a case), can be said to satisfy the words 'if any persons to the number of three or more together shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land,' it is impossible to conceive. To say that three persons are together, who are in different places, is a plain contradiction in terms. It might just as well be said that three persons, who entered into three different houses at the same time, were together when they were in those houses. The clause was framed to prevent and punish violence by numbers of persons being together—not merely forming one party,—but being so near to each other that they could aid and assist each other in committing violence. And if the clause had contained no reference to land at all, still

What is an entry within the statute.

A difference of opinion also exists as to what constitutes an entry within the meaning of this statute. It has been held that if persons standing in a road hang nets on the twigs of a hedge within a close, it is an entry within sec. 9. Some poachers standing in a lane spread their nets upon the twigs of a hedge, which separated the lane from the close; Alderson, B., said, 'I shall tell the jury that if they are satisfied that, in effecting a common purpose by all the defendants, the nets were hung upon the twigs of the hedge so as to be within the field, it was an entry. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Pickering v. Rudd,^(w) stated that he had once held that firing a gun loaded with shot into a field was a breaking of the close, and I am of opinion that if these defendants so placed the nets within the field it was an entry by them all.'^(x) But in a similar case it was held that if persons standing in a road set nets in the hedge-row of an adjoining field, and sent a dog into the field to drive game into the nets, this is not an entering of land within sec. 9. Poachers it must have been confined to those who were in such close proximity to each other as to be capable of assisting in the violence; and a fortiori must the clause be so limited in order to give effect both to the word 'together' and 'land.' See Reg. v. Jones, post, p. 661.

It is quite obvious too that though the primary object of this section be the prevention of violence, both the old and new Acts were really passed for the benefit of the owner of the particular land by the protection of the game. Sec. 1 is exclusively devoted to that object, and sec. 2 is exclusively devoted to that object and the protection of the owner, &c., in carrying that object into effect. And under sec. 2 this decision would lead to so many inconveniences that it is plain the Legislature never could have intended anything of the kind. In this case it is clear that under sec. 2, the poacher who was in 'The Spring' might have been apprehended; but it is equally clear that if the others had been on another person's land without any intent to take game there, they could not have been apprehended at all. It would be easy to multiply cases to show the strange results to which this decision would lead. But it will suffice to refer to the Day Game Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, some sections of which are plainly framed on this Act, and show beyond a doubt the meaning of it. Sec. 32 is introduced in terms for the purpose of protecting game from trespassers by a more summary means, and its terms are, 1st, 'if any person commit any trespass by entering or being, in the day-time, upon any land in search or pursuit of game,' &c.; 2nd, 'if any persons, to the number of five or more together, shall commit any trespass by entering or being in the day-time upon any land in search or pursuit of game,' &c.; and any person charged with 'any such trespass' may prove any matter which would be 'a defence to an action at law for such trespass.' Now, it is perfectly clear that 'land' here means one land; for 'trespass' means one trespass, and all the words of the clause with reference to land are in the singular number, 'leave,' 'licence,' 'occupier,' &c. Besides the clause is only a summary action of trespass, and who ever dreamt of several occupiers or owners of different lands joining in an action of trespass? This clause is the counterpart of 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, and sec. 31 of sec. 2 of that Act. Now by sec. 31, where any person is found on 'any land or upon any of his Majesty's forests, parks, chases, or warrens,' &c., 'any person having the right of killing the game upon such land,' &c., may require him to quit the land: now here as 'any of his Majesty's forests,' &c., means one forest; so 'any land' means one land, and 'such land,' applying both to 'any land' and 'any forest,' &c., must mean one land also. The same terms are in sec. 32, which corresponds to 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, and afford similar observations. And see sec. 36. It would be difficult to find a clearer legislative exposition by one Act of the terms in another than the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, affords of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69. It is to be observed also that in general the question will not be whether the prisoners are liable to no punishment at all, but whether they are liable to penal servitude for fourteen years under sec. 9, or penal servitude for seven years under sec. 2, or to be summarily dealt with under sec. 1. Patteson, Cresswell, and Williams, JJ., and Platt, B., who in Rég. v. Whittaker dissented from the decision were not present when Reg. v. Uezzell was decided.

were seen setting nets in the hedge-row of a field, they being on the other side of the hedge in a turnpike-road; they also sent a dog into the field, which drove a hare into one of the nets; it was contended that the sending of the dog into the field to drive the hares into the nets was, in point of law, an entering into the field; but it was held that it would be straining the words too much in a criminal case to hold that this was within the statute. (y) In one case (z) the Court declined to express an opinion whether it was necessary to a conviction of a defendant under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, or under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, that he should personally have gone into the close, or whether it might be sufficient that he, standing without, sent others in. But in a later case (a) strong opinions were uttered that the Legislature in the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, contemplated that the offender must personally be or enter on the land. Had the words been only 'commit any trespass on land in pursuit of game,' sending a dog upon the land would have been within the meaning of the words; but the words being 'commit any trespass by entering or being upon any land' the construction must be that there must be a personal entering or being on the land.

Where on an indictment on sec. 9 against three for entering Mount Coppice, it appeared that two of them were seen together running out of the coppice, and the third was almost immediately afterwards seen coming out of it alone, having a gun and a pheasant, and one of the others had a gun; Maule, J., said, 'the three prisoners must be shown to have acted together and in concert. It is not sufficient to show that all were in the close at the same time; there must be some proof of an association together. This is often done by showing that the parties were seen together previously, the day or evening before. There is no evidence of the kind here. It is, however, a question for the jury'; and the case was left to the jury accordingly. (b)

If the indictment state that the defendants entered into a certain close with intent, then and there, to kill game, it must be proved that the defendants had the intent to kill game in the particular close named. Thus, where upon an indictment under the repealed statute so laying the intent, the jury found that the defendant was still in pursuit of game, but they could not say whether in the close specified or elsewhere; the judges held that as the entry, with intent to kill game, was confined by the indictment to the close specified, it was necessary to prove the intent as to that close. (c) And upon a similar indictment under the new Act, where it appeared that the prisoners were seen in the field laid in the two first counts, but it was not shown that they were doing any act tending to the destruction of game in it; and it rather seemed that they were merely crossing it in their way from one wood to another; Parke, B., held that the two first counts made it necessary to show that the prisoners were in the field laid for the purpose of killing game there. (d) So where on a similar indictment for entering Breadstone Plantation, it appeared that a gun was heard about a quarter of a mile from the plantation, and the prisoners were seen in the plantation with a gun, and there were many pheasants roosting in the plantation, which the prisoners must have seen, but they did not fire at any of them. Coleridge, J., said, in summing up, 'You must say whether these persons were in this particular covert with an intent to kill game there. If you can suppose that they had gone out on that night poaching in every other covert in the county, that will not be sufficient to support the charge contained in this indictment, if they were not in this particular covert with intent to destroy game there. It lies on the prosecutor to make out to your satisfaction that the prisoners had an intent to kill game in this particular covert; the intent can in this case only be inferred from the conduct of the parties, and it is here shown that there was game which the defendants must have seen, but did not make the slightest attempt to destroy.' (e) On an indictment which charged that the prisoners were in the Great Ground with intent then and there to take game, it was proved that they were all in that close at 4 o'clock, A.M., when they were all taking up nets, which were spread against a gate and a gap in the fence; they had dogs with them, and when they had put the nets in a bag, they took up five hares which were lying dead on the ground about seven yards from the nets; it was contended that there was not sufficient evidence to prove that they were in the Great Ground with intent to take game there; and the previous cases were cited. Rolfe, B., 'The cases have certainly gone to that length under this statute, and as the indictment charges an intent then and there to take game, I shall, in deference to those cases, direct the jury that they must be satisfied the prisoners were in the Great Ground with intent then—that is at that hour—and there—that is in that spot—to take game. For my own part, however, I must say, I should have been inclined to hold that the offence was complete if a man were to be in one close and were to take game in the next.' 'It was no matter here where the hares were taken; though they were taken in another close, the nets were spread in the Great Ground, and the offence was complete, though no game was taken there, if they were there with intent to do so.' (f)

A doubt is stated in the marginal note of Rex v. Barham, (g) whether it is necessary that the defendant should have such an intent in the place in which he is found armed, unless it be so stated in the indictment, and Rex v. Worker (h) is referred to; but in that case, although the indictment was general, no such question arose; and it should seem that whether the words 'then and there' be in the indictment or not, the entry into the close must be proved to be with intent to kill game in such close, for unless such be the case the entry was made into that close, not with intent to kill game, but with some different intent, as, for instance, to pass over it. And where it appeared that the prisoners were in Shutt Leasowe, a place named in the indictment, and which adjoined Short Wood, and were apparently going to the wood, Patteson, J., said, 'the intent was evidently to kill game in the wood, into which none of the parties ever got for that purpose; it is true that they are charged with being in Slutt Leasowe, but they had no intention of killing game there; they must be acquitted.' (i)

(e) Rex v. Gainer, 7 C. & P. 231.(f) Reg. v. Turner, 3 Cox C. C. 304.(g) R. & M., C. C. R. 151.(h) R. & M., C. C. R. 165.

The indictment must in some way or other particularise the place; for the defendant has a right to know to what specific place the evidence is to be directed: and stating that in the parish of A. the party entered into a certain close there, was held not sufficient under the repealed statute. The first count of an indictment stated, that the defendant, at the parish of Whitford, in the county of Northumberland, having entered into a certain close there situate, with intent there illegally to kill game, was there found at night armed with a certain gun; and the second count charged him in like manner with having entered into a certain inclosed ground; but neither the close nor the inclosed ground were described by name, ownership, occupation, or abutments. And upon a case reserved, Abbott, C.J., Holroyd, J., and Park, J.A.J., thought any such description unnecessary; but Burrough, J., Garrow, B., Best, J., Hullock, B., and Bayley, J., thought otherwise, because this was substantially a local offence, and the defendant was entitled to know to what specific place the evidence was to be directed; and the judgment was arrested. (k) So it has been held under the new statute that an indictment for entering 'a covert in the parish of A.' is too general. (l) But it has been held sufficient to allege that the defendants entered certain land

(i) Reg. v. Davis, 8 C. & P. 759. It does not appear whether the indictment had the words 'then and there' in it; but, whether it had or not, the observations of the very learned judge appear to have been made generally, and without any reference to the form of the indictment.

(k) Rex v. Ridley, T. T. 1823. R. & R. 515.

(l) Rex v. Crick, 5 C. & P. 508, Vaughan, B. It is very usual to describe the close simply as belonging to A. B., especially after describing it by name and occupation in previous counts. In some cases this may lead to inconvenience to the prisoner, and as it applies equally to every close belonging to A. B., who may be the owner of a large number of closes, it admits of doubt whether such a description be not insufficient, and the more so, as it is very possible that the grand jury may have found the bill, because they considered the offence proved as to one close, and the petit jury may convict, because they think the offence proved as to a different close. The first count charged the entry into the Nineteen Acres, the second into the same close in the occupation of a person named, the third into inclosed land belonging to Sir R. Peel. The prisoners were seen crossing the Nineteen Acres in the direction from a wood, in which shots had been previously heard, towards a wood on the other side of the Nineteen Acres. The whole belonged to Sir R. Peel. There was no evidence that the prisoners were in pursuit of game in the Nineteen Acres; and as the case had been conducted on the part of the prosecution, as if the charge related to the Nineteen Acres only, in addressing the jury I only adverted to the evidence applicable to that close, and contended, that the prisoners were entitled to be acquitted, as they were not proved to have entered that close for the purpose of poaching; and Parke, B., held that was so as to the two first counts, but that the third was applicable to the wood, from which the prisoners were coming, and on this count the prisoners were convicted. Rex v. Capewell, 5 C. & P. 549. Now, there can be little doubt that the third count was inserted to prevent an acquittal, on the ground of variance in the description in the two first counts, and was intended to apply to the Nineteen Acres, and equally little doubt that the grand jury found the bill with reference to the Nineteen Acres only. In all cases where the close is described in general terms, it would be prudent to apply for a particular of the close in which the offence is intended to be proved, which I apprehend the Court would order to be delivered, as it is the usual course in all cases, where an indictment is so general as not to afford the defendant sufficient information. See ante, p. 456. C. S. G.

in the occupation of a person named, without stating whether the land was enclosed or not. (m)

A variance in the name stated is fatal.

If the name of the close be stated in the indictment, and the name be misstated, it is fatal. An indictment alleged that the defendants entered a certain wood called 'The Old Walk,' in the occupation of the Earl of Waldegrave: it appeared that the wood had always been called 'The Long Walk,' and upon a case reserved, the judges held the variance was fatal. (n) Where an indictment described the land as 'Digmore Plantation, of and belonging to Sarah Harriett Williams,' and she was a widow generally known as Mrs. Hosier Williams, and Sarah Harriett Hosier Williams, Hosier having been the name of a former husband, but she would be quite as well known by the name of Sarah Harriett Williams, and could not be mistaken for any other person; it was held that the description in the indictment was sufficient. (o)

Where an indictment for night-poaching described the land as land 'of and belonging to J. W. Dod,' Patteson, J., held that it was sufficient, as that meant that the land was in his occupation. (p)

Alias dictus.

An indictment alleged that the prisoners, 'late of the parish of Foffants, otherwise called Fofants, otherwise called Fovant,' entered 'certain land called Foffants, otherwise called Fofants, otherwise called Fovant;' and it was objected that the indictment was uncertain as to the parish and the wood, as they were both described under these several names; Coleridge, J., held that there was nothing in the objection, 'as all the names were idem sonans.' (q)

The indictment must allege not only an entry by night, but an arming by night.

The indictment must allege not only an entry by night, but an arming by night. An indictment alleged that the defendants did by night unlawfully enter divers closes and inclosed lands, and were then and there in the said closes and lands, armed with guns for the purpose of then and there taking and destroying game; it was objected that the words 'then and there' did not mean that the defendants were there by night, but only on the day, and at the place aforesaid; and it was held that the indictment was bad. If the words 'by night' had occurred at the beginning of the sentence, they might have governed the whole, or if they had been at the end of the sentence they might have referred to the whole; but here they are in the middle of the sentence, and are applied to a particular branch of it, and cannot be extended to that which follows. The two members of the sentence are distinct; the first states the entry into the closes by night, but does not state that the defendants were armed or the intent with which they entered; the second branch states, that they were in the closes armed, for the purpose of destroying game, but does not state that they were there by night. Neither of those branches of the sentence contains all that is requisite to constitute an offence within the statute, and the two being distinct the indictment is bad. (r)

In an indictment for night-poaching it is sufficient to allege that the prisoners unlawfully entered, and it is not necessary to allege the facts which made the entry unlawful. (s) And in such an indictment it is sufficient to allege an intent to take game without specifying the particular kind of game. (t)

The indictment need not contain any specific allegation that the defendants entered the close between the expiration of the first hour after sunset and the beginning of the last hour before sunrise, the period which by the twelfth section of the statute it is provided shall be considered night. (u)

The indictment may contain counts not only on the ninth section, but also on the second for assaulting a gamekeeper authorized to apprehend, for assaulting a gamekeeper in the execution of his duty, and for a common assault, (v) and if there be any doubt as to the number of persons not amounting to three, or the proof of their being out in pursuit of game, it certainly would be prudent to add such counts in all cases where an assault has been committed. Where an indictment, after stating the entry into the land by night, proceeded thus, the defendants 'being then and there by night as aforesaid armed with a gun;' and it was objected that this averment was not sufficient, because 'then' meant only the day and year aforesaid, and not the time of the entry; Parke, B., said, he would leave the defendants to their writ of error, but advised the insertion of the words, 'at the time when they so entered,' in such indictments in future. (w) Where an indictment alleged, that the defendants did enter, and were in certain land, they 'being then and there by night as aforesaid armed with guns, and other offensive weapons,' and it was objected that the indictment did not contain any sufficient allegation that the defendants were armed when they entered the land; it was held that the indictment was sufficient, as all the requisites of the statute had been complied with. (x) Where there was one indictment for shooting at a gamekeeper with intent to murder him, and another indictment for night-poaching, both founded on the same transaction, it was held that the prosecutor was not bound to elect which he would proceed upon, as the offences were quite distinct, and one of them could not possibly merge in the other. Spode, and in the occupation of a tenant, and it was contended that in order to show that the prisoner was 'unlawfully' there, it must be shown by direct evidence that he had not the permission either of the tenant or landlord; the jury found the prisoner guilty, and unless the particular proof suggested was necessary, there was abundant evidence, not merely that the prisoner and those with him were on the land, but also in their conduct that they were unlawfully there; and upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. If persons are found at night armed and using violence to keepers, it cannot be necessary to call the tenant of the land or the owner to prove they were not there by permission. (z)

BOOK THE THIRD.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSONS OF INDIVIDUALS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF MURDER.

MURDER is the killing any person under the King's peace, with malice prepense or aforethought, either express or implied by law. (a) Of this description the malice prepense, malitia præcogitata, is the chief characteristic, the grand criterion by which murder is to be distinguished from any other species of homicide; (b) and it will therefore be necessary to inquire concerning the cases in which such malice has been held to exist. It should, however, be observed, that when the law makes use of the term malice aforethought as descriptive of the crime of murder, it is not to be understood merely in the sense of a principle of malevolence to particulars, but as meaning that the fact has been attended with such circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit; a heart regardless of social duty, and deliberately bent upon mischief. (c) And in general any formed design of doing mischief may be called malice; and therefore not such killing only as proceeds from premeditated hatred or revenge against the person killed; but also, in many other cases, such killing as is accompanied with circumstances that show the heart to be perversely wicked, is adjudged to be of malice prepense, and consequently murder. (d)

Malice may be either express or implied by law. Express malice is, when one person kills another with a sedate deliberate mind and formed design: such formed design being evidenced by external circumstances, discovering the inward intention; as lying in wait, antecedent menaces, former grudges, and concerted schemes to do the party some bodily harm. (e) And malice is implied by law from any deliberate cruel act committed by one person against another, however sudden: (f) thus where a man kills another suddenly without any, or without a considerable provocation, the law implies malice; for no person, unless of an abandoned heart, would be guilty of such an act upon a slight or no apparent cause. (g) So if a man wilfully poisons another; in such a deliberate act the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved. (h) And where one is killed in consequence of such a wilful act as shows the person by whom it is committed to be an enemy to all mankind, the law will infer a general malice from such depraved inclination to mischief. (i) And it should be observed as a general rule, that all homicide is presumed to be malicious, and of course amounting to murder, until the contrary appears, from circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification: (k) and that it is incumbent upon the

(i) 1 Hale, 474. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 29, s. 12. 4 Blac. Com. 200. 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 18. Malitia, in its proper or legal sense, is different from that sense which it bears in common speech. In common acceptation it signifies a desire of revenge, or a settled anger against a particular person: but this is not the legal sense; and Lord Holt, C. J., says: 'Some have been led into mistakes by not well considering what the passion of malice is; they have construed it to be a rancour of mind lodged in the person killing for some considerable time before the commission of the fact, which is a mistake, arising from the not well distinguishing between hatred and malice. Envy, hatred, and malice are three distinct passions of the mind.' Kel. 127. Amongst the Romans, and in the civil law, malitia appears to have imported a mixture of fraud, and of that which is opposite to simplicity and honesty. Cicero speaks of it (De Nat. Deor. Lib. 3, s. 30) as 'versuta et fallax nocendi ratio;' and in another work (De Offic. Lib. 3, s. 18) he says, 'mihi quidem etiam veræ hereditates non honestæ videntur si sint malitiosis (i.e. according to Pearce, a malo animo profectis) blanditiis officiorum; non veritate, sed simulatione quæsitæ.' And see Dig. Lib. 2, Tit. 13, Lex 8, where, in speaking of a banker or cashier giving his accounts, it is said, 'Ubi exigitur argentarius rationes edere, tunc punitur cum dolo malo non exhibet * * * Dolo malo autem non edit, et qui malitiose edidit, et qui in totum non edit.' Amongst us malice is a term of law importing directly wickedness, and excluding a just cause or excuse. Thus Lord Coke, in his comment on the words per malitiam, says, 'if one be appealed of murder, and it is found by verdict that he killed the party se defendendo, this shall not be said to be per malitiam, because he had a just cause.' 2 Inst. 384. And where the statutes speak of a prisoner on his arraignment standing mute of malice, the word clearly cannot be understood in its common acceptation of anger or desire of revenge against another. Thus where the 25 Hen. 8, c. 3, says, that persons arraigned of petit treason, &c., standing

'mute of malice or froward mind,' or challenging, &c., shall be excluded from clergy, the word malice, explained by the accompanying words, seems to signify a wickedness or frowardness of mind in refusing to submit to the course of justice; in opposition to cases where some just cause may be assigned for the silence, as that it proceeds from madness, or some other disability or distemper. And in the statute 21 Edw. 1, De malefactoribus in parcis, trespassers are mentioned who shall not yield themselves to the foresters, &c., but 'immo malitiam suam prosequendo et continuando,' shall fly or stand upon their defence. And where the question of malice has arisen in cases of homicide, the matter for consideration has been (as will be seen in the course of the present and subsequent chapters) whether the Act were done with or without just cause or excuse; so that it has been suggested (Chapple, J., MS. Sum.) that what is usually called malice implied by the law would perhaps be expressed more intelligibly and familiarly to the understanding if it were called malice in a legal sense. Malice, 'in its legal sense, denotes a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.' Per Littledale, J. M'Pherson v. Daniels, 10 B. & C. 272, and approved by Cresswell, J., as the more intelligible expression in Reg. v. Noon, 6 Cox C. C. 137. 'We must settle what is meant by the term malice. The legal import of this term differs from its acceptation in common conversation. It is not, as in ordinary speech, only an expression of hatred and ill-will to an individual, but means any wicked or mischievous intention of the mind. Thus in the crime of murder, which is always stated in the indictment to be committed with malice aforethought, it is neither necessary in support of such indictment to show that the prisoner had any enmity to the deceased, nor would proof of absence of ill-will furnish the accused with any defence, when it is proved that the act of killing was intentional, and done without any justifiable cause.' Per Best, J. Rex v. Harvey, 2 B. & C. 268.

(k) 4 Blac. Com. 201. In Rex v. Greenacre, 8 C. & P. 35, Tindal, C. J., said, 'where it appears that one person's death has been occasioned by the hand of prisoner to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the Court and jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him. (l) It should also be remarked that, where the defence rests upon some violent provocation, it will not avail, however grievous such provocation may have been, if it appears that there was an interval of reflection, or a reasonable time for the blood to have cooled before the deadly purpose was effected. And provocation will be no answer to proof of express malice; so that if, upon a provocation received, one party deliberately and advisedly denounce vengeance against the other, as by declaring that he will have his blood, or the like, and afterwards carry his design into execution, he will be guilty of murder; although the death happened so recently after the provocation as that the law might, apart from such evidence of express malice, have imputed the act to unadvised passion. (m) But where fresh provocation intervenes between preconceived malice and the death, it ought clearly to appear that the killing was upon the antecedent malice; for if there be an old quarrel between A. and B., and they are reconciled again, and then, upon a new and sudden falling out, A. kills B., this is not murder. (n) It is not to be presumed that the parties fought upon the old grudge, unless it appear from the whole circumstances of the fact: (o) but if upon the circumstances it should appear that the reconciliation was but pretended or counterfeit, and that the hurt done was upon the score of the old malice, then such killing will be murder. (p)

Provocation is no answer where there is express malice.

Where knowledge of some fact is necessary to make a killing murder, those of a party who have the knowledge will be guilty of murder, and those who have it not of manslaughter only. If A. assault B. of malice, and they fight, and A.'s servant come in aid of his master, and B. be killed, A. is guilty of murder; but the servant, if he knew not of A.'s malice, is guilty of manslaughter only. (q)

The person committing the crime must be a free agent, and not subject to actual force at the time the fact is done: thus if A. by force take the arm of B. in which is a weapon, and therewith kill C., A. is guilty of murder, but not B. But if it be only a moral force put upon B., as by threatening him with duress or imprisonment, or even by an assault to the peril of his life, in order to compel him to kill C., it is no legal excuse. (r) If, however, A. procures B., an idiot, or lunatic, to kill C., A. is guilty of the murder as principal, and B. is merely an instrument. (s) So if A. lay a trap or pitfall for B., whereby B. is killed, A. is guilty of the murder as a principal in the first degree, the trap or pitfall being only the instruments of death. (t) If one persuade another to kill himself, the adviser is guilty of murder; (u) and if the party takes poison himself by the persuasion of another, in the absence of the persuader, yet it is a killing by the persuader; and he is principal in it, though absent at the taking of the poison. A girl of

of age.

A girl of thirteen years of age was indicted for the murder of an infant ten weeks old. She had bought a threepenny packet of 'Battle's Vermin Killer,' saying that her mistress had sent her for it, which was false. 'Battle's Vermin Killer' is a powder containing about three-quarters of a grain of strychnine in the threepenny packet. When she was told that a coroner's inquest would be held, she asked, 'Will they know whether it's poisoned or not?' and being answered 'They will,' she said, 'How can they know? they are only men like master.' She afterwards asked whether they would commit her to prison? and thereon a person said, 'Surely you have not poisoned anything?' The prisoner said, 'I have given it poison, but I did not think it would kill it so soon.' Being asked whether she gave the poison in liquid or powder, she said, 'In powder;' and being asked why, she said, 'Because I was tired of hugging the child about.' It was urged that it was not proved that the prisoner had capacity to commit the crime, or had acted with deliberate malice. Pollock, C. B., 'The crimes of murder and manslaughter are, in some instances, very difficult of distinction. The distinction which seems most reasonable consists in the consciousness that the act done was one which would be likely to cause death. No one could commit murder without that consciousness. The jury must be satisfied before they could find the prisoner guilty [of murder] that she was conscious, and that her act was deliberate. They must be satisfied that she had arrived at that maturity of intellect which was a necessary condition of the crime charged.' (x) killed.

Murder may be committed upon any person within the King's peace. Therefore, to kill an alien enemy within the kingdom, unless it be in the heat and actual exercise of war, (y) or to kill a Jew, an outlaw, one attainted of felony, or one in a præmunire, (z) is as much murder as to kill the most regular born Englishman. (a)

An infant in its mother's womb, not being in rerum naturâ, is not considered as a person who can be killed within the description of murder: and therefore if a woman being quick or great with child, take any potion to cause an abortion, or if another give her any such potion, or if a person strike her, whereby the child within her is killed, it is not murder or manslaughter. administering poison, or other noxious thing, to procure the miscarriage of any woman, or unlawfully using any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, is guilty of felony. (c)

Where a child, having been born alive, afterwards died by reason of any potions or bruises it received in the womb, it seems always to have been the better opinion that it was murder in such as administered or gave them. (d) Giving a child, whilst in the act of being born, a mortal wound in the head, as soon as the head appears; and before the child has breathed, will, if the child is afterwards born alive, and dies thereof, and there is malice, be murder; but if there is not malice, manslaughter. The prisoner was indicted for the manslaughter of an infant child; the prisoner, who practised midwifery, was called in to attend a woman who was taken in labour, and when the head of the child became visible, the prisoner, being grossly ignorant of the art which he professed, and unable to deliver the woman with safety to herself and the child, as might have been done by a person of ordinary skill, broke and compressed the skull of the infant, and thereby occasioned its death immediately after it was born: it was submitted that the indictment was misconceived, though the facts would warrant an indictment in another form; and that the child being en ventre sa mère at the time the wound was given, the prisoner could not be guilty of manslaughter; but, the prisoner having been found guilty, the judges, upon a case reserved, were unanimously of opinion, that the conviction was right. (e)

Upon an indictment against Ann West for murder it appeared that S. Henson, being with child, went to the prisoner and underwent an operation for the purpose of procuring abortion. This operation was repeated on several days, and Henson was shortly after delivered of a male child, she being then about six months advanced in her pregnancy: the child was born alive, but died about five hours afterwards. A medical witness stated that there were no unusual appearances on the child, and that it was a healthy child; but that, being born at that period of gestation, it was impossible that it could live any considerable length of time separated from the womb of its mother. The witness added, 'Judging from the healthy appearance of the child, I cannot suppose that the premature delivery was spontaneous. The operations described by Henson would naturally and probably produce that premature delivery. It might be produced by a fall, or any sudden shock received by the mother: but in this case I have no doubt it was produced by the acts of the prisoner.' (f) Maule, J., told the jury that if a person intending to procure abortion does an act which causes a child to be born so much earlier than the natural time that it is born in a state much less capable of living, and afterwards dies in consequence of its exposure to the external world, the person who by her misconduct so brings the child into the world, and puts it thereby into a situation in which it cannot live, is guilty of murder. The evidence seems to show clearly that the death of the child was caused by its premature birth; and if that premature delivery was brought on by the felonious act of the prisoner, then the offence is complete. If the child, by the felonious act of the prisoner, was brought into the world in a state in which it was more likely to die than it would have been if born in due time, and did die in consequence, the offence is murder, and the mere existence of a possibility that something might have been done to prevent the death, would not render it less murder. (g)

The murder of bastard children by the mother was considered as a crime so difficult to be proved, that a special legislative provision was made for its detection by the 21 Jac. 1, c. 27, which required that any such mother endeavouring to conceal the death of the child, should prove, by one witness at least, that the child was actually born dead. But this law, which made the concealment of the death almost conclusive evidence of the child's being murdered by the mother, was accounted to savour strongly of severity, and always construed most favourably for the unfortunate object of accusation; and at length it was repealed, together with an Irish Act upon the same subject, by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58.

A child must be actually born to be the subject of murder.

Questions of considerable nicety sometimes arise on trials for infanticide, as to whether the death took place after the child was actually born, or whilst it was in the progress of being born; and although the law be clear that a child must be actually born to be the subject of murder, perhaps it is not clearly settled what constitutes actual birth for this purpose. Where, on an indictment alleging that the prisoner was delivered of a child, and that she afterwards strangled it, it appeared that the child, which was found concealed, had breathed, but the medical men could not say whether it had breathed during the birth or afterwards; Littledale, J., told the jury, 'the being born must mean that the whole body is brought into the world, and it is not sufficient that the child respires in the progress of the birth.' (h)

Breathing not sufficient, as it may be before the child is actually born.

So where, upon an indictment containing a count for murder by stabbing, and a count charging that before the child was completely born the prisoner stabbed it with a fork, and that it was born, and then died of the stab, it was proved that a puncture was found on the child's skull, but when that injury was inflicted did not appear, and some questions were asked as to whether the child had breathed; Parke, J., said, 'The child might breathe before it was born; but its having breathed is not sufficiently life to make the killing of the child murder; there must have been an independent circulation in the child, or the child cannot be considered as alive for this purpose.' (i)

v. Wright, 9 C. & P. 754, Gurney, B. S. P.

So where the first count of an indictment charged that the prisoner, being big with a female child, did bring forth the said child alive, and did afterwards strangle it, and other counts varied the statement of the mode of death, but all of them stated the birth of the child as above mentioned; and it appeared that the dead body of the child was found concealed under the prisoner's bed, with a ribbon tied tightly round the neck, and the evidence of the medical witnesses left it in doubt whether the ribbon was tied round the neck, and the child strangled by it, during the progress of birth, or after the child was fully born, but before the umbilical cord was severed: and it was submitted that a child could not be the subject of murder till it had a completely independent circulation, and had been wholly detached from the mother; that the term 'born alive' meant the being completely separated from the mother, and having a completely independent circulation; and a child would not have an independent circulation for some time after it was completely brought forth, unless the umbilical cord was divided. Parke, B., said, 'it has been frequently so said in cases where the death has been caused by suffocation, or other injuries, which might have occurred in the course of unassisted delivery; but I should like to know whether there is any case where it has been so held where a wilful wound has been inflicted during the birth of a child. (k) At all events, this indictment will not be supported, unless it be shown that the child was completely born, as it is distinctly averred that the child was brought forth before it was strangled.' And in summing up the very learned Baron said, 'Whether there might be any question on a count differently framed, it is not necessary to say; perhaps there might not; but in order to convict on the first count you must be satisfied that the whole body of the child had come forth from the body of the mother when the ligature was applied. If you think that the child was not killed after it came forth, you will acquit. I think it is essential that it should have been wholly produced. But supposing you should be of opinion that the child was strangled intentionally, while it was connected by the umbilical cord to the mother, and after it was wholly produced, in that case I should put the matter into a course of further inquiry, directing you to convict the prisoner, and reserving the point for a higher tribunal; my present impression being, that it would be murder, if those were the facts of the case.' (l) And in a subsequent case, where this case was mentioned, and the prisoner's counsel admitted, that it did not go to the length of deciding that the child must have a separate independent existence from that of the mother, in order to make the killing of it murder; Vaughan, J., said, 'I should have been very much surprised if it had, because, if that were the law, the child and the after-birth might be completely delivered, and yet, because the umbilical cord was not separated, the child might be knocked on the head and killed, without the party who did it being guilty of murder.' (m) And where one count charged that the prisoner, being big with a female child, 'did bring forth the same alive,' and then in the usual manner alleged the murder of the child by choking it with a handkerchief; and another count charged the murder in the same way of a certain illegitimate child, 'then lately before born of the body' of M. T.; and there was strong evidence to prove that the child had been wholly produced alive from the prisoner's body, and that she had strangled it; but it was also clearly proved by the surgeon, who examined the body of the child, that it must have been strangled before it had been separated from the mother by the severance of the umbilical cord, and the surgeon further stated that a child has, after breathing fully, an independent circulation of its own, even while still attached to the mother by the umbilical cord, and that in his judgment the child in question had breathed fully after it had been wholly produced, and had therefore an independent circulation of its own before and at the time it was strangled, and was then in a state to carry on a separate existence. Erskine, J., directed the jury, that if they were satisfied that the child had been wholly produced from the body of the prisoner alive, and that the prisoner wilfully strangled the child after it had been so produced and while it was alive, and while it had, according to the evidence of the surgeon, an independent circulation of its own, he was of opinion that the charge in the said counts was made out, although the child, at the time it was so strangled, still remained attached to the mother by the navel-string. The jury found the prisoner guilty; and, upon a case reserved, the judges held the conviction right. (n) Where the prisoner was indicted for the murder of her child by cutting off its head, and a surgeon stated that he was enabled to say decidedly that the child had breathed, but he could not swear that the whole body of the child was born when the act of breathing took place; Coltman, J., said, 'In order to justify a conviction for murder, you must be satisfied that the entire child was actually born into the world in a living state. The fact of its having breathed is not a decisive proof that it was born alive: it may have breathed, and yet died before birth.' (o) But if a child be actually wholly produced alive, it is not necessary that it should have breathed to make it the subject of murder. Upon an indictment for the murder of a child, where it appeared that the dead body of the child was found in a river, and it was proved by two surgeons that it had never breathed; Park, J. A. J., said, 'A child must be actually wholly in the world in a living state to be the subject of a charge of murder; but if it has been wholly born, and is alive, it is not essential that it should have breathed at the time it was killed, as many children are born alive, and yet do not breathe for some time after their birth.' Of the means

If a child be wholly produced, and then destroyed, it is murder, although the umbilical cord be not severed.

The killing may be effected by poisoning, striking, starving, drowning, and a thousand other forms of death, by which human nature may be overcome. (q) But there must be some external violence, or corporal damage, to the party; and therefore where a person, either by working upon the fancy of another, or by harsh and unkind usage, puts him into such passion of grief or fear that he dies suddenly, or contracts some disease which causes his death, the killing is not such as the law can notice. (r) If a man however does an act, the probable consequence of which may be, and eventually is, death, such killing may be murder; although no stroke be struck by himself, and no killing may have been primarily intended: (s) as where a person carried his sick father, against his will, in a severe season, from one town to another, by reason whereof he died; (t) or where a harlot being delivered of a child, left it in an orchard covered only with leaves, in which condition it was killed by a kite; (u) or where a child was placed in a hogstye, where it was devoured. (v) In these cases, and also where a child was shifted by parish officers from parish to parish, till it died for want of care and sustenance, (w) it was considered that the acts so done, wilfully and deliberately, were of malice prepense.

Where the probable consequence of an act is death, and death ensues, it is murder.

Where the prisoner had delivered herself by night upon a turnpike road, and, after carrying her child more than a mile along the road, had left it on the side of the road without any clothing or covering to protect it from the inclemency of the weather, where it died from the cold, and she had wholly concealed the birth of the child till she was apprehended; Coltman, J., in summing up, said, 'If a party so conduct himself with regard to a human being, which is helpless and unable to provide for itself, as must necessarily lead to its death, the crime amounts to murder. But if the circumstances are not such that he must have been aware that the result would be death, the crime would be manslaughter, provided the death were caused by an unlawful act, but not such as to imply a malicious mind. There have been cases where it has been held that persons leaving a child exposed, and without any assistance, and under circumstances where no assistance was likely to be rendered, were guilty of murder. It will be for you to consider whether the prisoner left the child in such a situation that to all reasonable apprehension she must have been aware that the child must die, or whether there were circumstances that would raise a reasonable expectation that the child would be found by some one else, and preserved; because then it would only be the crime of manslaughter. If a person were to leave a child at the door of a gentleman, the probability would be so great that it would be found, that it would be too much to say that it was murder, if it died: if, on the other hand, a child were left in an unfrequented place, what inference could be drawn but that the party left it there in order that it might die? This is a sort of intermediate case, and therefore it is for you to say whether the prisoner had reasonable ground for believing that the child would be found and preserved.' (x) heap of dust and ashes, and leaving it there exposed to the cold air, by means of which exposure the child became frozen, and died.(y)

Forcing a person to do an act which is likely to produce his death, and which does produce it, is murder; and threats may constitute such force. The indictment charged first that the prisoner killed his wife by beating; secondly, by throwing her out of the window; and, thirdly and fourthly, that he beat her and threatened to throw her out of the window and to murder her; and that by such threats she was so terrified that, through fear of his putting his threats into execution, she threw herself out of the window, and of the beating and the bruises received by the fall died. There was strong evidence that the death of the wife was occasioned by the blows she received before her fall: but Heath, J., Gibbs, J., and Bayley, J., were of opinion that if her death was occasioned partly by the blows and partly by the fall, yet if she was constrained by her husband's threats of further violence, and from a well-grounded apprehension of his doing such further violence as would endanger her life, he was answerable for the consequences of the fall, as much as if he had thrown her out of the window himself. The prisoner however was acquitted; the jury being of opinion that the deceased threw herself out of the window from her own intemperance, and not under the influence of the threats. (z)

Where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the deceased was riding on horseback, and that the prisoner assaulted and struck him with a stick, and that the deceased, from a well-grounded apprehension of a further attack, which would have endangered his life, spurred his horse, whereby it became frightened, and threw the deceased, &c., and it was proved that the prisoner struck the deceased with a small stick, and that he rode away, the prisoner riding after him, and on the deceased spurring his horse, it winced and threw him; it was held, on the authority of the preceding case, that the case was proved. (a)

The act must be done to avoid the violence of the prisoner.

But the act done by the deceased which occasions his death must be done in order to avoid the violence of the prisoner. Upon a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased had some dispute about paying for some spirits, and the first witness swore that the deceased's boat being alongside the schooner in which the prisoner was, the prisoner pushed it with his foot, and the deceased stretched out over the bow of the boat, to lay hold of a barge, to prevent the boat drifting away, and losing his balance fell overboard, and was drowned. Park, J. A. J., after consulting Patteson, J., said, that they were of opinion that,

The point in this case was, that it was consistent with all that was stated in the count that the child might be capable of taking care of itself; but it was held that if she had been sufficiently old, or strong enough so to do, the death could not have arisen from the act of the prisoner, and therefore the defect was cured by the verdict. It is a novel doctrine in criminal cases that a defective indictment is cured by verdict. Lord Hale says, 'None of the statutes of jeofails extend to indictments, and therefore a defective indictment is not aided by verdict,' 2 Hale, P. C. 193; and no authority is known for such a doctrine in other cases. The indictment was right; for it alleged the acts of the prisoner which caused the death, and that is all that it ever was necessary to do in such an indictment.

if the case had rested on the evidence of the first witness, it would not have amounted to a case of manslaughter. (b) So where upon an indictment for murder by drowning, by the deceased slipping into the water in endeavouring to escape from an assault made with intent to murder or rob, it appeared that the body was found in a river, and it bore marks of violence, but not sufficient to occasion death, which appeared to have been caused by drowning, and there were marks of a struggle on the bank of the river; Erskine, J., told the jury that a man might throw himself into a river under such circumstances as rendered it not a voluntary act, by reason of force applied either to the body or the mind; and it then became the guilty act of him who compelled the deceased to take the step. But the apprehension must be of immediate violence, and well grounded from the circumstances by which the deceased was surrounded; not that the jury must be satisfied that there was no other way of escape, but that it was such a step as a reasonable man might take. (c)

Upon the same principles, where there is found to be actual malice, or a wilful disposition to injure another, or an obstinate perseverance in doing an act necessarily attended with danger, without regard to the consequences, as if a master by premeditated negligence, or harsh usage, cause the death of his apprentice, it will be murder. Thus, where the prisoner, upon his apprentice returning to him from Bridewell, whither he had been sent for misbehaviour, in a lousy and distempered condition, did not take that care of him which his situation required, and which he might have done; not having suffered him to lie in a bed on account of the vermin, but having made him lie on the boards for some time without covering, and without common medical care; and the death of the apprentice, in the opinion of the medical witnesses, was most probably occasioned by his ill-treatment in Bridewell, and the want of care when he went home; and they inclined to think that, if he had been properly treated when he came home, he might have recovered; the Court, under these circumstances, and others in favour of the prisoner, left it to the jury to consider, whether the death of the apprentice was occasioned by the ill-treatment he received from his master after returning from Bridewell, and whether that ill-treatment amounted to evidence of malice; in which case they were to find him guilty of murder. (d) The prisoner Charles Squire, and his wife, were indicted for the murder of a boy who was bound as a parish apprentice to the prisoner Charles; and it appeared that both the prisoners had used the apprentice in a most cruel and barbarous manner, and had not provided him with sufficient food and nourishment: but the surgeon who opened the body deposed that in his judgment the boy died from debility, and for want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received. Lawrence, J., was of opinion that the case was defective as to the wife, as it was not her duty to provide the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment, she being the servant of her husband, and so directed the jury, who acquitted her; but the husband was found guilty and executed. (e)

A master is not bound by the common law to find medical advice for a servant, but a master is bound during the illness of an apprentice to provide him with proper medicines, and if he neglect so to do he is criminally responsible. The prisoner was indicted for the manslaughter of his apprentice by neglecting to provide him sufficient meat and drink, &c. The deceased was bound to the prisoner by indenture, by which he covenanted to find him clothes and victuals; his death was produced, according to the evidence of some medical men, by uncleanness and want of food; Patteson, J., told the jury that 'by the general law a master was not bound to provide medical advice for his servant; (f) yet that the case was different with respect to an apprentice, and that a master is bound during the illness of his apprentice to provide him with proper medicines; and that if they thought that the death of the deceased was occasioned, not by the want of food, &c., but by want of medicines, then, in the absence of any charge to that effect in the indictment, the prisoner would be entitled to be acquitted.' (g) Where a master has treated a person, bound to him by an invalid indenture of apprenticeship, as his servant, and such person dies through the neglect of the master to provide him with food, the master cannot defend himself against an indictment for manslaughter on the ground that he was not legally bound to provide such person with food. An indictment for manslaughter in one count alleged that the deceased was the apprentice of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to provide sufficient food for her as such apprentice, and that he neglected to do so, &c., by means of which she died; in another count it alleged that the deceased was the servant of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to provide her with food, &c. An invalid indenture of apprenticeship was put in, and it appeared that the deceased had always been treated as an apprentice by the prisoner, and had performed such duties as an apprentice would have performed, but the prisoner being a farmer these duties were the same as those performed by ordinary farmers' servants: it was objected that the first count was not proved, as the indenture was invalid; and that the relation of master and servant never existed, for an invalid contract of apprenticeship could not be converted into a hiring and service:

After the surgeon had deposed that the boy died from debility, and for want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received, the learned judge was proceeding to inquire of him whether, in his judgment, the series of cruel usage the boy had received, and in which the wife had been as active as her husband, might not have so far broken his constitution as to promote the debility, and co-operate along with the want of proper food and nourishment to bring on his death, when the surgeon was seized with a fainting fit, and, being taken out of court, did not recover sufficiently to attend again upon the trial. The judge, after observing that, upon the evidence, as it then stood, he could not leave it to the jury to consider, whether the wounds, &c., inflicted on the boy, had contributed to cause his death, said, that if any physician or surgeon were present who had heard the trial, he might be examined as to the point intended to be inquired into; but no such person being present, he delivered his opinion to the jury, as stated in the text.

that the foundation of this indictment was that the prisoner was legally bound to provide maintenance for the deceased, and here it was clear he could neither have been compelled to support her as an apprentice or as a servant; but it was held, that the prisoner having treated the deceased as his servant, could not turn round and say she was not his servant at all. (h) Where the first count stated that the deceased was the apprentice of the prisoner, and it was his duty to provide the deceased with proper and necessary nourishment, medicine, medical care and attention, and charged the death to be from neglect, &c.; and the second count charged that the deceased 'so being such apprentice as aforesaid,' was killed by the prisoner by over-work and beating; and the only evidence given to show that the deceased was an apprentice was, that the prisoner had stated that he was his apprentice; Patteson, J., held, that there was sufficient evidence to support the second count, but not the first. Where the mother of a bastard child marries after the passing of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, the new Poor Law Act, and such child afterwards dies (after it has been weaned) (k) through neglect to provide it with sufficient food, the omission to provide food is the omission of the husband, and in order to render the wife criminally responsible it must be shown that the husband supplied her with food to give to the child, and that she wilfully neglected to give it. The prisoner, who was the wife of J. S., was charged with the murder of her illegitimate child, aged three years, by omitting to give it proper food. The prisoner had in December, 1834, married J. S.; the deceased was her illegitimate child, and was born before her marriage; in the judgment of medical witnesses the death had proceeded from the want of proper food. For the prosecution Rex v. Squire, (l) and the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, were referred to; and it was submitted that the mother of an illegitimate child was bound to take care of her child, and might be guilty of murder if its death arose from neglect. Alderson, B.: 'The prisoner is indicted as a married woman: if her husband supplied her with food for this child, and she wilfully neglected to give it to the child, and thereby caused its death, it might be murder in her. (m) In these cases the wife is in the nature of the servant of the husband: it does not at all turn upon the natural relation of mother: to charge her you must show that the husband supplied her with food to give to the child, and that she wilfully neglected to give it. There is no distinction between the case of an apprentice and that of a bastard child, and the wife

Where a bastard dies through the omission to supply it with food, the omission is the omission of the man who has married the mother since the New Poor Law Act. The mother is only responsible if she wilfully omits to give it food provided by her husband.

(o) Rex v. Saunders, 7 C. & P. 277.

This case was decided on the opening of counsel, and it did not appear whether the wife was living with her husband, or whether he was capable of maintaining the child. By the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, the mother of every child born a bastard after the passing of the Act, 'so long as she shall be unmarried or a widow, shall be bound to maintain such child as a part of her family, until such child shall attain the age of sixteen.' By sec. 57, every man who, after the passing of the Act, marries a woman having a child or children, either legitimate or illegitimate, 'shall be liable to maintain such child or children as a part of his family' until sixteen, or until the death of the mother. In Laing v. Spicer, Tyrw. & Gr. 358, 1 M. & W. 129, it was held that the putative father of a bastard, on whom an order of maintenance had been made, under the 18 Eliz. c. 2, s. 2, and 49 Geo. 3, c. 68, before the passing of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, was no longer liable under such order, where the mother since the passing of that Act had married a person capable of supporting the child; and the Court seemed to think that the putative father would not be liable, even if the husband were incapable of supporting the child. It seems to follow, from this decision, and from the words of sec. 71, that the liability of the mother of a bastard under that Act wholly ceases upon her marriage; and it is presumed that it was upon this ground that Reg. v. Saunders was decided. No notice was taken in that case of any common-law liability to support a bastard. In 1 Blac. Com. 457, it is said, 'the duty of parents to their bastard children by our law is principally that of maintenance; for though bastards are not looked upon to any civil purposes, yet the ties of nature, of which maintenance is one, are not so easily dissolved; and they hold, indeed, as to many other intentions; as particularly that a man shall not marry his bastard sister or daughter,' (citing Hains v. Jeffell, 1 Lord Raym. 68. Comb. 356). And this is in accordance with Puffendorf, book 4, c. 11, s. 6, who says, 'maintenance is due not to legitimate children alone, but to natural and even to incestuous issue.' In Nichole v. Allen, 3 C. & P. 36, Lord Tentenden, C. J., held that there was not only a moral but a legal obligation on a putative father to maintain his bastard child; and though this case seems to be overruled by Mortimore v. Wright, 6 M. & W. 482, as to there being no necessity for a promise on the part of the father to pay for the maintenance of the child; this point seems not to have been questioned. It seems, therefore, that there is this distinction between an apprentice and the bastard of the wife, that there is neither a moral nor a legal obligation on the wife to maintain an apprentice, but there certainly is a moral, and it should seem a legal obligation to support a bastard. In a note to Rex v. Saunders, the reporters observe, 'an Act of parliament (18 Eliz. c. 3, s. 2) would hardly have been required to fix the mother with the payment of a weekly sum, if at common law she is liable for the entire maintenance of the child.' This observation might have been entitled to weight, if there had not been similar provisions to compel the maintenance of legitimate children. These statutes were probably introduced for the purpose of giving a ready means of enforcing a legal obligation by compelling the payment of a sufficient sum to indemnify the parish while the children were supported by it. With regard to legitimate children, it is the duty of their parents, by the common law, to provide for their maintenance. 1 Blac. Com. 446; see Puff. L. of N., book 4, c. 11, s. 4. This duty may be enforced, in the case of poor children, by the 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6, as well on the father as on the mother, being of sufficient ability. By the 5 Geo. 1, c. 8, if either father or mother leave their children a charge upon a parish, the goods of the father or mother may be seized and sold, and the rents of their lands received in discharge of the parish. And by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3, every person able, wholly or in part, to maintain himself, herself, or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, whereby any of his or her family becomes chargeable, is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person, and punished accordingly. It should seem that there may be cases where a wife may be liable to maintain her children during her husband's lifetime, as where the husband has deserted her, or she has a separate maintenance (see Christian's note to 1 Blac. Com. 448), and it may be worthy of consideration

Hook and Elizabeth Bubb, and under their care and control, and unable to provide for or take care of herself, and that it was the duty of the prisoners to provide for and administer to M. Hook sufficient food for the support of her body, and that the prisoners feloniously, &c., did refuse and neglect to give and administer to M. Hook sufficient food for the support of her body; whereby she became mortally sick and died. (p) The case against Bubb was, that she was the sister of Hook's deceased wife, and on her death had gone to live with Hook, and became the manager of his household. He was absent from home except from Saturday night until Monday morning, but always provided ample food for the whole family. Hook's children were healthy till Bubb undertook their management, but she systematically neglected them, especially the deceased, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the neighbours, persisted in withholding sufficient food, for want of which the child gradually wasted away, and died of actual starvation. Williams, J., told the jury that 'the indictment alleges, first, a duty on the part of the prisoner to supply the necessaries of life to the child; it alleges, secondly, a malicious neglect or omission to perform that duty; and it alleges, thirdly, that the omission or neglect caused the death of the child. Now, first, with respect to the proposition that it was the duty of the prisoner to provide food necessary to sustain the life of the child. It is quite clear that the circumstance of the prisoner being aunt of the child, or being resident in the same house with the child, was not sufficient to cast upon her the duty of providing food for it. But if the prisoner undertook the charge of attending to the child, and of taking that care of it which its tender age required, a duty then arose to perform those duties properly; and if the prisoner, being in the capacity, as it were, of a servant or nurse, and having the charge of attending and taking care of the child, was furnished with the means of doing so properly, then the duty arose, which is charged in this indictment, of giving it sufficient food, and if the prisoner neglected to perform that duty, beyond all question she is criminally responsible. It remains for me to explain to what extent she is responsible. If the omission or neglect to perform the duty was malicious, then the indictment would be supported, and the crime of murder would be made out against the prisoner; but if the omission or neglect were simply culpable, but not arising from a malicious motive on the part of the prisoner, then it would be your duty to find her guilty of manslaughter only. And here it becomes necessary to explain what is meant by the expression malicious, which is thus used. If the omission to supply necessary food was accompanied with an intention child to a servant, who has the care of the child, and she wilfully omits to give the food to the child, with intent to cause either the death of the child, or serious bodily injury to it, she is guilty of murder.

whether where the husband is incapable of work, but she is capable of maintaining her children, she is not legally bound so to do; and as the overseers of every parish are bound by law to provide necessary support in cases of emergency, it may well be doubted whether cases may not occur where the wife would be legally bound to apply for relief to the parish officers. Suppose a husband were ill in bed, but the wife well, and the children starving for want of food, could it be fairly contended that she was under no legal obligation to apply for relief for them, and that if one of them died for want of food, she was not criminally responsible? See Umston v. Newcomen, 4 A. & E. 899, and Reg. v. Mabbett, infra, p. 683. C. S. G.

(p) The grand jury returned a bill for murder against E. Bubb, and for manslaughter against R. Hook, and a bill for manslaughter in the same form, mutatis mutandis, as the bill for murder was then preferred against the latter, and Bubb tried first.

to cause the death of the child, or to cause some serious bodily harm to it, then it would be malicious in the sense imputed to it by this indictment, and in a case of this kind it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand how a person who contemplated doing serious bodily injury to the child by the deprivation of food, could have meditated anything else than causing its death. You will, therefore, probably consider that the question resolves itself into this: did the prisoner contemplate, by the course she pursued, the death of the child? If she did, and death was caused by the course she pursued, then she is guilty of murder. But if you are not satisfied that she contemplated the death of the child, then, although guilty of a culpable neglect of duty, it would amount only to the crime of manslaughter. If, on the other hand, you should think either that she did not undertake the duty of supplying the child with proper food, or that she did not culpably neglect that duty, then you will acquit her.' (q)

Where a father supplies a servant with food for his child, and the servant neglects to give it to the child and thereby causes death, the father may be guilty if he is aware of the course pursued by the servant, and allows it to be continued.

On the trial of Hook for the manslaughter of the same child, in addition to the facts proved on the trial of Bubb, it was proved that when he was at home she treated the children better than on other occasions; and that he had uniformly behaved kindly to them, and especially to the deceased. Williams, J., told the jury that 'this case differs from the last in this very essential particular, that here there is a duty directly cast upon the prisoner to provide sufficient food for the child if he has sufficient means for doing so, and inasmuch as it is proved that the prisoner had such means, there can be no doubt but that the law threw upon him the duty of preserving the child's life by providing it with proper food. But the peculiarity of the case is this, that inasmuch as we must take it that Bubb was guilty, she could not have been so, unless the prisoner had provided her with sufficient means for feeding the child, and it must be taken as an admitted fact in this case that the prisoner did take such steps as, but for Bubb's misconduct, would have preserved the child's life. Then the question is, how is the charge shaped against the prisoner? If Bubb neglected her duty by depriving the child of food for any purpose, and the prisoner was conscious of it, and nevertheless chose to let her persevere in that course, he thus became himself an instrument, as it were, of depriving the child of sufficient food, and he would be guilty upon this indictment. If, therefore, you think he was conscious that Bubb deprived the child of food to such an extent as to render it dangerous to the child's life, and, being so conscious, instead of preventing her from continuing in this course, he allowed her to do so, and was culpably negligent of the obvious duty cast upon him, then he is guilty of manslaughter, because then substantially he would have neglected to provide the child with proper food.' (r)

The duties of a parent and servant to a child differ.

Where parent, child, and servant reside in the same house, the duty of the parent is to provide food for the child, and the duty of the servant is to supply the food when so provided by the

(q) Reg. v. Bubb, 4 Cox C. C. 455. The indictment also alleged the duty to provide clothing and the neglect thereof; but as the child is alleged to have died of 'actual starvation,' all relating to the clothing has been omitted. This and the next case underwent the most careful consideration, and the law on the subject was fully discussed between Williams, J., Lord Campbell, C. J., and the Editor, on a review of the previous cases.

parent to the child, an indictment therefore charging both with the same duty cannot be supported; but there ought to be separate indictments charging each in respect of the duty incumbent on each. (s)

Upon an indictment against husband and wife for the murder of their infant child, it appeared that the child's death was produced by English cholera, and that insufficient food had a tendency to produce that complaint; the husband was in work, but he spent the money he obtained on himself; and the wife did not appear to have any money or food to give to the child; Martin, B., consulted Erle, J., and they were of opinion that it was the bounden duty of all persons having children, when they themselves cannot support them, to endeavour to obtain the means of getting them support, and if they wilfully abstain from going to the union, where by law they have a right to support, and their children die in consequence, they are criminally responsible for it; but there ought to be a distinct abstaining to go for several days: and if a married woman neglects for four or five days to go to the union for the purpose of getting support for a child, she knowing that such neglect would be likely to produce the death of the child, it is manslaughter. (t)

The prisoner was tried for the murder of her daughter: the case for the prosecution was that the prisoner, having great ill-will against the deceased, had purposely neglected to procure a midwife, or other proper person to attend her daughter when she was taken in labour, and that by reason thereof she died in childbirth; she was about eighteen years of age and unmarried. The prisoner had married a second husband, and after the marriage the daughter had lived with them for some time, and then went out to service, occasionally returning to live with them when she was out of place; at last she returned to her step-father's house on a Tuesday, and continued there till the Saturday following, when she died. It was objected that the prisoner was under no legal obligation to procure or try to procure the attendance of a midwife. Williams, J., directed the jury to consider whether it was established by the evidence that the death was attributable to the prisoner's neglect to use ordinary diligence in procuring the assistance of a midwife, or other proper attendant, and, if it was so established, then to consider whether by so neglecting she intended to bring about the death of her daughter; and if so, the jury were to convict her of murder; but if not, of manslaughter: the jury convicted her of manslaughter; and it was held that there was not an omission of any duty rendering the prisoner liable to be convicted. Assuming that if she had used ordinary care she would have procured the attendance of a midwife; that she knew where a midwife could be found; and that if the midwife had been summoned she would have attended; her skill must have been paid for, and there was no evidence that the prisoner had the means at her command of paying for that skill. The midwife would probably have attended without being paid. Yet the prisoner could not be criminally responsible for not asking for that aid, which, perhaps, might have been given without compensation. Aid of this kind was not always required in childbirth, and sometimes no ill consequences resulted from its absence. (u)

Mother not bound to provide necessities for her child before birth.

Where on an indictment for murder of an infant it appeared that the infant was found dead in a bag without any preparation having been made for it by the prisoner, it was held that she was not guilty of manslaughter, if she knew she was about to be delivered, and wilfully abstained from taking the necessary precautions to preserve the life of the child after its birth, and the child died in consequence of that neglect. (v)

A mother is bound to provide for the safety of her child.

The prisoner was indicted for the manslaughter of her child, and it appeared that she had been delivered of the child whilst on the seat of a privy, and that the child had breathed. The prisoner was seventeen years old, subject to epileptic fits, and this was her first child. Erle, J., told the jury that 'our law casts upon certain persons the duty of affording protection and sustenance to others who may be subjected to their control. Masters are bound to provide for their apprentices; parents are bound to take care of and sustain their children; and if in consequence of their failing to perform their duties death ensues, it is murder or manslaughter in the master or parent, according to circumstances. The question in this case is, whether there was any negligence on the part of the mother in not providing for the safety of her offspring. It is but reasonable to presume that the child dropped from her whilst she was on the privy. Now, if you think that she had the means and the power of procuring such assistance as might have saved the life of the child, by neglecting to do so she would be clearly guilty of manslaughter. But it is proper that you should take into your consideration that the prisoner is very young; that this was her first child; that she was subject to epileptic fits, and that the probability is that the child could have survived but a very few moments after its immersion in the soil.' (w)

Where a child is not weaned the wife is answerable if she neglect to suckle it.

Where a child is very young and not weaned, the mother is criminally responsible if the death arose from her not suckling the child when she was capable of doing so. The prisoner, who was indicted for manslaughter, was a married woman, and was the mother of the deceased, who, at the time of its death, was little more than three months old and not weaned. Patteson, J., said, 'in the case of an older child, it would be the duty of the husband to supply food; but in a case like the present, the mother would be liable, if the death arose from her not suckling the child when she was capable of doing so.' Where a party undertakes to provide necessaries for a person, who is so aged and infirm that he is incapable of doing so for himself, and through his neglect to perform his undertaking death ensues, he is criminally responsible; so also if a party confines another, he is bound to provide him with necessaries, and if he neglects so to do, and in consequence thereof the party dies, he is criminally responsible. Upon an indictment for murder, which stated that the deceased was of great age, and was residing in the house and under the care and control of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to take care of and find her sufficient meat, &c., and then alleged her death to have been caused by confining her against her will, and not providing her with meat and other necessaries; it appeared that she was seventy-four years of age, and that upon the death of her sister, with whom she had lived, the prisoner, who attended the funeral, took the deceased home with him, saying she was going home to live along with him till affairs were settled, and he would make her happy and comfortable; and on another occasion the prisoner had said that in consideration of a transaction, which he mentioned, he had undertaken to keep the deceased comfortable as long as she lived. When the deceased first went to the prisoner's a servant was kept, and the deceased lodged in the back parlour; afterwards she was removed into the kitchen. After some time no servant was kept, and the deceased was waited on by the prisoner and his wife, and she remained locked in the kitchen alone, sometimes by the prisoner and sometimes by his wife, for hours together; and on several occasions had complained of being confined; in the cold weather no fire was discernible in the kitchen, and for some time before her death the deceased was continually locked in the kitchen, and not out of it at all. An undertaker's man stated that, from the appearance of the body, he thought she had died from want and starvation. A surgeon proved that the immediate cause of death was water on the brain; that the appearance of all parts of the body betokened the want of proper food and nourishment, that there was great emaciation of the body, and that the water on the brain might have been produced by exhaustion. Patteson, J. 'If the prisoner was guilty of wilful neglect, so gross and wilful that you are satisfied he must have contemplated the death of the deceased, then he will be guilty of murder; (z) if, however, you think only that he was so careless, that her death was occasioned by his negligence, though he did not contemplate it, he will be guilty of manslaughter. The cases which have happened of this description have been generally cases of children and servants, where the duty has been apparent. This is not such a case; but it will be for you to say whether from the way in which the prisoner treated her, he had not by way of contract, in some way or other, taken upon him the performance of that duty, which, she from age and infirmity, was incapable of doing.' dence as to the contract, the very learned Judge added), 'This is the evidence on which you are called on to infer that the prisoner undertook to provide the deceased with necessaries; and though, if he broke that contract, he might not be liable to be indicted during her life, (a) yet if by his negligence her death was occasioned, then he becomes criminally responsible.' Where husband and wife are separated under an agreement that he shall allow her a sum per week, and he does so regularly, Quære, whether if she come and demand shelter at night being very ill, and the night very cold, and he refuse to give her shelter, and in consequence she is exposed to the weather during that night, and her death thereby caused, he is guilty of manslaughter.

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner four years previously had separated from his wife, by mutual consent, the prisoner allowing her 2s. 6d. a-week, which had been in general regularly paid, and the last payment was on the Sunday preceding her death. On the Tuesday she was turned out of her lodgings, being at that time suffering from diarrhoea. On the Wednesday she was in a house in a state of great illness, when the prisoner passed by, and was told he must take his wife away, as she could not shelter there. The prisoner replied, 'Turn her out; I won't be pestered with her,' and then walked away. The same evening, which was wet and dark, she was seen by a constable wandering about seeking shelter. He took her to the house where the prisoner lodged, and told him the state of his wife, who was ill and without lodging, and explained to him that it was incumbent on him to provide her with lodging and relief. He replied that he had no lodging for her; that she was a nasty beast, and he could not live with her. He shut the window and went away. On the Thursday the prisoner offered to pay for a bed for her at a public house, and she went to bed. On the Friday she died. The deceased was labouring under a complication of diseases, which must have speedily resulted in death. The surgeon stated that he considered the period of her existence had been abridged in consequence of her not having had shelter on the Wednesday night. Gurney, B., told the jury that there was no ground for any charge against the prisoner, as having caused her death from want of food, as he had regularly paid her allowance to her, and he might have been compelled to pay her a larger sum if that had not been sufficient. Under ordinary circumstances he might have refused to have anything to do with her, but when she was ill and without shelter on a cold and wet night, the question assumed a different aspect, and it was whether they could certainly conclude that his refusal to give her shelter at that time had the effect of causing her death to occur sooner than that event would have happened in the ordinary course of nature. In a former part of this work many cases have been mentioned where children of tender years and lunatics have been neglected, abandoned, or ill-treated; but it is sufficient to refer to those decisions in this place. (d)

(c) But a very long period has elapsed since this offence has been holden to be murder; and in the last instance of a prosecution for it, the prisoners having been convicted, judgment was respited, in order that the point of law might be more fully considered upon a motion in arrest of judgment. (f) The then attorney-general, however, declining to argue the point, the prisoners were discharged of that indictment; but it should seem that there are good grounds for supposing that the attorney-general declined to argue this point from prudential reasons, and principally lest witnesses might be deterred from giving evidence upon capital prosecutions if it must be at the peril of their own lives, but not from any apprehension that the point of law was not maintainable. She said she had received the mixture from a person who came from Ireland. It makes no difference whether the party be a regular physician or surgeon or not, if he act honestly and use his best skill to cure.

And it seems now to be settled that it makes no difference whether the party be a regular physician or surgeon or not. Thus it has been held that if a person bonâ fide and honestly exercising his best skill to cure a patient, perform an operation, which causes the death of the patient, it makes no difference whether such person be a regular surgeon or not, nor whether he has had a regular education or not. Upon an indictment for manslaughter by causing the death by thrusting a round piece of ivory against the rectum, and thereby making a wound through the rectum, it appeared that upon examination of the body after death, a small hole was discovered perforated through the rectum. The prisoner had attended the deceased, but there was no evidence to show how the wound had been caused, and questions were put in order to show that it might have been the result of natural causes, and it was proposed to show that the prisoner had had a regular medical education, and that a great number of cases had been successfully treated by him. Hullock, B. (stopping the case), 'This is an indictment for manslaughter, and I am really afraid to let the case go on, lest an idea should be entertained that a man's practice may be questioned whenever an operation fails. In this case there is no evidence of the mode in which this operation was performed; and even assuming for the moment that it caused the death of the deceased, I am not aware of any law which says that this party can be found guilty of manslaughter. It is my opinion that it makes no difference whether the party be a regular or irregular surgeon: indeed, in remote parts of the country, many persons would be left to die, if irregular surgeons were not allowed to practise. There is no doubt that there may be cases where both regular and irregular surgeons might be liable to an indictment, as there might be cases where, from the manner of the operation, even malice might be inferred. All that the law-books (q) have said has been read to you, but they do not state any decisions, and their silence in this respect goes to show what the uniform opinion of lawyers has been upon this subject. As to what is said by Lord Coke, he merely details an authority, a very old one, without expressing either approbation or disapprobation; however, we find that Lord Hale has laid down what is the law on this subject. That is copied by Mr. J. Blackstone, and no book in the law goes any further. It may be that a person not legally qualified to practise as a surgeon may be liable to penalties, but surely he cannot be liable to an indictment for felony. It is quite clear you may recover damages against a medical man for want of skill; but as my Lord Hale (r) says, "God forbid that any mischance of this kind should make a person guilty of murder or man-obtained, undertakes to administer medicine which may have a dangerous effect, and thereby occasions death, such person is guilty of manslaughter. He may have no evil intention, and may have a good one; but he has no right to hazard the consequence in a case where medical assistance may be obtained; if he does so, it is at his peril. It is immaterial whether the person administering the medicine prepares it or gets it from another.' This case was doubted by Mr. Alley, in Rex v. St. John Long, 4 C. & P. 434, and it seems inconsistent with the subsequent cases. C. S. G.

slaughter." Such is the opinion of one of the greatest judges that ever adorned the bench of this country; and his proposition amounts to this, that if a person, bonâ fide and honestly exercising his best skill to cure a patient, performs an operation, which causes the patient's death, he is not guilty of manslaughter. In the present case no evidence has been given respecting the operation itself. It might have been performed with the most proper instrument and in the most proper manner, and yet might have failed. Mr. L. has himself told us that he performed an operation, the propriety of which seems to have been a sort of rexata questio among the medical profession; but still it would be most dangerous for it to get abroad, that, if an operation performed either by a licensed or unlicensed surgeon should fail, that surgeon would be liable to be prosecuted for manslaughter.' (s)

Where a person, who had been in the habit of acting as a man-midwife, tore away part of the prolapsed uterus, supposing it to be a part of the placenta, it was held that he was not indictable for manslaughter by thus causing the death, unless he was guilty of criminal misconduct, arising either from the grossest ignorance, or the most criminal inattention. The prisoner, who was indicted for the murder of Mrs. D., was not a regularly educated accoucheur, but was a person who had been in the habit of acting as a man-midwife among the lower classes of people. Mrs. D. had been delivered by the prisoner on a Friday, and on the Sunday following an unusual appearance took place, which the medical witnesses stated to be a prolapsus uteri; this the prisoner mistook for a remaining part of the placenta, which had not been brought away at the time of the delivery: he attempted to bring away the prolapsed uterus by force, and in so doing he lacerated the uterus, and tore asunder the mesenteric artery; this caused the death of the patient; and it appeared, from the testimony of a number of medical witnesses, that there must have been great want of anatomical knowledge in the prisoner. It was proved that the prisoner had safely delivered many other women. Lord Ellenborough, C. J.: 'There has not been a particle of evidence adduced which goes to convict the prisoner of the crime of murder, but still it is for you to consider whether the evidence goes as far as to make out a case of manslaughter. To substantiate that charge, the prisoner must have been guilty of criminal misconduct, arising either from the grossest ignorance, or the most criminal inattention. One or other of these is necessary to make him guilty of that criminal negligence and misconduct, which is essential to make out a case of manslaughter. It does not appear that in this case there was any want of attention on his part; and from the evidence of the witnesses on his behalf, it appears that he had delivered many women at different times, and from this he must have had some degree of skill.' A medical practitioner must be guilty of criminal misconduct, arising from the grossest ignorance or most criminal inattention, to render him guilty of manslaughter.

St. John Long's first case. A person acting as a medical man, whether licensed or not, is not criminally responsible for a patient's death, unless his conduct shows gross ignorance of his art, or gross inattention to his patient's safety.

Upon an indictment for manslaughter by feloniously rubbing Miss C. with a dangerous liquid, it appeared that two of the family had died of consumption, but that Miss C. had enjoyed good health. Mrs. C. having heard that the prisoner had said that unless Miss C. put herself under his care she would die of consumption in two or three months, placed her under his course of treatment. The prisoner rubbed a mixture on different parts of the bodies of his patients, and this had been applied to Miss C. on the 3rd of August by the prisoner's servant, and by his direction. On Friday, the 13th of August, a witness went with Miss C. to the prisoner's, respecting a wound on her back, and Miss C. then inhaled; on the next day the prisoner examined her back, and said it was in a beautiful state, and that he would give one hundred guineas if he could produce a similar wound on the persons of some of his patients. The prisoner's attention being directed to a part of the wound which was of a darker appearance, he stated that this proceeded from the inhaling, and that unless those appearances were produced he could expect no beneficial result. The wound at this time was about five or six inches square. Miss C. was suffering much from sickness, and the prisoner said that it was of no consequence, but, on the contrary, a benefit; and that those symptoms, combined with the wound, were a proof that his system was taking due effect. On Sunday, the 15th, Miss C. having got worse, the prisoner said that in two or three days she would be better in health than she had ever been in her life, and spoke very confidently that the result of his system would prolong her life, and that no person could be doing better than she was. At this interview the wound, which had extended, was shown to the prisoner. At the same time he was desired to do something to stop the sickness, but he said he had a remedy in his pocket, which he would not apply, as he knew the sickness had been beneficial: and he also stated on that day, and on Monday, the 16th, that Miss C. was doing uncommonly well. On Tuesday, the 17th, she died. An eminent surgeon proved that on the Monday her back was extensively inflamed as large as a plate, and in the centre was a spot, as large as the palm of the hand, black, and dead, and in a mortified state, and he thought that some very powerfully stimulating liniment had been applied to her back; that applying a lotion of a strength capable of causing the appearances he saw, to a person of the age and constitution of the deceased, if in perfect health, was likely to damage the constitution and produce disease and danger. The appearances on the back were quite sufficient to account for her death. On the most careful examination of the body, after death, no latent disease or seeds of disease were discovered. It was submitted, for the defence, that, in point of law, this was nothing like a case of manslaughter, and 1 Hale P. C. 429, 4 Bl. C. b. 4, c. 14, and Reg v. Van Butchell, (u) were cited and relied on. Park, J. A. J., 'I am in this difficulty; I have an opinion, and my learned Brother differs from me: I must, therefore, let the case go the jury.' make no distinction between the case of a person, who consults the most eminent physician, and the cases of those whose necessities or whose folly may carry them into any other quarter. It matters not whether the individual consulted be the president of the College of Physicians, the president of the College of Surgeons, or the humblest bone-setter of the village; but be it one or the other, he ought to bring into the case ordinary care, skill, and diligence. Why is it that we convict in cases of death by driving carriages? Because the parties are bound to have skill, care, and caution. I am of opinion that, if a person, who has ever so much or so little skill, sets my leg, and does it as well as he can, and does it badly, he is excused; but suppose the person comes drunk, and gives me a tumbler full of laudanum, and sends me into the other world, is it not manslaughter? And why is that? Because I have a right to have reasonable care and caution.' Park, J., in summing up, 'The learned counsel truly stated in the outset, that whether the party be licensed or unlicensed is of no consequence, except in this respect that he may be subject to pecuniary penalties for acting contrary to charters or Acts of Parliament; but it cannot affect him here.' (After citing 1 Hale, 429 as an authority in point, the learned judge proceeded,) 'I agree with my learned Brother, that what is called mala praxis in a medical person is a misdemeanor; but that depends upon whether the practice he has used is so bad that everybody will see that it is mala praxis. The case at Lancaster (v) differs from this case. I have communicated with Tindal, C. J., who tried that case, and he informed me that the man was a blacksmith, and was drunk, and so completely ignorant of the proper steps, that he totally neglected what was absolutely necessary after the birth of the child. That certainly was one of the most outrageous cases that ever came into a court of justice. I would rather use the words of Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Williamson. (w) (His Lordship read them.) 'And this is important here, for though he be not licensed, yet experience may teach a man sufficient; and the question for you will be, whether the experience this individual acquired does not negative the supposition of any gross ignorance or criminal inattention?' (After setting the authority of Hale P. C. 429, against the dictum of Lord Coke, 4 Inst. 251, and citing the observations of Hulloek, B., in Rex v. Van Butchell (x) with approbation, his Lordship proceeded,) 'The refusal by the prisoner to apply the medicine in order to stop the sickness, although he had it with him, would, in my opinion, if wickedly done, amount to murder; but he mentioned a case in which sickness had been beneficial. Undoubtedly the result proves a very erroneous opinion on his part, and it seems singular that the restlessness and other circumstances did not awaken apprehension, and call for further measures, but the question again recurs, whether this was an erroneous judgment of a person, who was of general competency, though he unfortunately failed in the particular instance.' 'With respect to the application of the mixture, if he commanded the servant to use it, it is the same as if he used it himself. Perhaps from the evidence you will think that the act caused the death; but still the question recurs, as to whether it was done either from gross ignorance or criminal inattention. No one doubts Mr. B.'s skill, but that is not quite the question; it is not whether the act done is the thing that a person of Mr. B.'s great skill would do, but whether it shows such total and gross ignorance in the person who did it, as must necessarily produce such a result. On the one hand, we must be careful and most anxious to prevent people from tampering in physic, so as to trifle with the life of man; and, on the other, we must take care not to charge criminally a person who is of general skill, because he has been unfortunate in a particular case.' [500]

The important consideration in these cases is, whether in reference to the remedy the party has used, he has acted with a due degree of caution, or, on the contrary, has acted with gross and improper rashness and want of caution. Upon a similar indictment against the same person for causing the death of Mrs. L. it appeared that she put herself under his care on the 6th of October, at which time she was in very good health, to be cured of a complaint she had in her throat. On the 3rd she had applied a small blister to her throat, but the wound occasioned by it was nearly well on the 6th. On the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th she went to the prisoner's, and on the evening of the 10th complained to her husband of a violent burning across her chest, in consequence of which he looked at it, and found a great redness across her bosom, darker in the centre than at the other parts; she also complained of great chillness, and shivered with cold, and passed a very restless and uncomfortable night. On the 11th she was very unwell all the day, the redness was more vivid, and the spot in the centre darker, round the edges white and puffed up, and there was a dirty white discharge from the centre. Cabbage leaves had been applied. On the 12th the redness on the breast and chest was, if anything, greater. In consequence of the symptoms, the husband went to the prisoner, who asked why Mrs. L. had not come to inhale, and go on with the rubbing; the husband replied it was impossible, she was so ill; she had been constantly unwell since the night of the 10th, and was suffering a great deal of pain and sickness: the prisoner said it would soon go off, it was generally the case. He was told of the shivering and chillness, and that some hot wine and water had been given to relieve her; he said hot brandy and water would have been better, and to put her head under the bed clothes. He was told that her chest and breast looked very red and very bad; he said that was generally the case in the first instance, but it would go off as she got better, and that the husband need not be uneasy about it, as there was no fear or danger. In the course of the day the cabbage leaves had been removed, and a dressing of spermaceti ointment put on the chest instead. In the evening the prisoner came and saw Mrs. L. and looked at her breast, and observing the dressing said those greasy plasters had no business there, and she ought to have continued the cabbage leaves. She said she could not bear the pain of keeping them on. He then took off his great coat and said that he would rub it out, and turned up the cuff of his coat as if for the purpose of doing so. She exclaimed very much with fright, and expressed her wonder that he should think of rubbing in the state her breast was in. She asked if there was no way of keeping the leaf on without touching the breast; and he asked her what she wished; she replied to be healed. He said it would never heal with those greasy plasters; that was not the way in which he healed sores. He then asked for a towel, and began dabbing it on the breast, particularly in the centre, where the discharge came from. He said that old linen was the best thing to heal a wound of that kind. She said her skin and flesh were very healthy, and always healed immediately with the simple dressing she had used. He said old linen was better, but she might use the dressing if she liked it, he saw no objection, and, when it skinned over he would rub it again. He never saw her afterwards; she died on the 8th of November. A surgeon proved that on the 12th of October he found a very extensive wound covering the whole anterior part of the chest, which, in his opinion, might be produced by any strong acid: the skin was destroyed; the centre of the wound was darker, and in a higher state of inflammation than the other parts; he considered the wound very dangerous to life when he first saw it: the centre spot, and the upper part became gangrenous in about a week; and in his opinion Mrs. L. died of the wound, and according to his judgment it was not necessary or proper to produce such a wound to prevent any difficulty in swallowing, and he did not know of any disease, in which the production of such a wound would be necessary or proper. The body was internally and externally in perfect health, except a little narrowness at the entrance of the oesophagus. Another surgeon stated that he thought that a man of common prudence or skill would not have applied a liquid which in two days would produce such extensive inflammation; though all irritating external applications sometimes exceeded the expectations of the medical attendant; but he should say that such conduct was a proof of rashness and of ignorance. It was submitted that this was not manslaughter, but homicide per infortunium; that where the mind is pure, and the intention benevolent, and there are no personal motives, such as a desire of gain, if an operation be performed, which fails, the party is not responsible; and that the indictment, which in substance charged that the death was occasioned by the external application, was not supported. There was no count imputing ignorance or want of skill, or hastiness, or roughness of practice. Bayley, B. 'I agree with Lord Hale, (z) and do not think that there is any difference between a licensed and unlicensed surgeon. It does not follow that in the case of either, an act done may not amount to manslaughter. There may be cases in which a regular medical man may be guilty; and that is all that Lord Hale lays down. And that may be laid out of the question in this case.

St. John
case.

But the manner in which the act is done, and the use of due caution, seem to me to be material. Mr. J. Foster, p. 263, speaking of a person who happens to kill another by driving a cart or other carriage, says. "If he might have seen the danger, and did not look before him, it will be manslaughter for want of due circumspection." And there is also a passage in Bracton to the like effect. But all that I mean to say now is, that there being conflicting authorities, and the impression on our minds not being in your favour, I propose to reserve the point. As to the indictment not being supported by the evidence, one of the allegations is that the prisoner feloniously applied a noxious and injurious matter. And there is no doubt, if the jury should be of opinion against the prisoner, that the facts proved will be sufficient to warrant their finding that the prisoner feloniously did the act; for if a man, either with gross ignorance or gross rashness, administers medicine and death ensues, it will be clearly felony.' It was then objected that in this case, as in larceny, there must be a trespass proved. It was not proved that any fraud had been practised by the prisoner to get the patient under his care; nor had there been any avaricious seeking after fees: if there had been it might have been evidence to show the existence of trespass. In Rex v. Van Butchell, (a) the case was stopped, because there was no evidence of how the operation was performed, and here there was not any evidence to show the mode in which the application was made. Bayley, B. 'In this case we may judge of the thing by the effect produced, and that may be evidence from which the jury may say, whether the thing which produced such an effect was not improperly applied.' Bolland, B. 'When you pass the line which the law allows, then you become a trespasser.' Bayley, B. 'If I had a clear opinion in your favour, or if my Brothers had, or if we had any reason to think that other judges were of a different opinion, it would become our duty to give our opinion here, and prevent the case from going to the jury: but feeling as I do, notwithstanding all I have heard to-day, and myself and my Brothers having had our attention directed to the law before we came here, I think it right that the case should go to the jury; I think that if the jury shall find a given fact in the way in which I shall submit it to them, it will constitute the crime of feloniously administering, so as to make it manslaughter. I do not charge it on ignorance merely, but there may have been rashness; and I consider that rashness will be sufficient to make it manslaughter. As for instance, if I have the tooth-ache, and a person undertakes to cure it by administering laudanum, and says, "I have no notion how much will be sufficient," but gives me a cup full, which immediately kills me; or if a person prescribing James's powder says, "I have no notion how much should be taken," and yet gives me a tablespoonful, which has the same effect; such persons acting with rashness will, in my opinion, be guilty of manslaughter. With respect to what has been said about a willing mind in the patient, it must be remembered that a prosecution is for the public benefit, and the willingness of the patient cannot take away the offence against the public.' In summing up, Bayley, B., said 'the points for your consideration are, first, whether Mrs. L. came to her death by the application of the liquid; secondly, whether the prisoner, in applying it, has acted feloniously or not. To my mind it matters not whether a man has received a medical education or not; the thing to look at is, whether, in reference to the remedy he has used, and the conduct he has displayed, he has acted with a due degree of caution, or, on the contrary, has acted with gross and improper rashness and want of caution. I have no hesitation in saying for your guidance, that if a man be guilty of gross negligence in attending to his patient after he has applied a remedy, or of gross rashness in the application of it, and death ensues in consequence, he will be liable to a conviction for manslaughter. 'If you shall be of opinion that the prisoner made the application with a gross and culpable degree of rashness, and that it was the cause of Mrs. L.'s death, then, heavy as the charge against him is, he will be answerable on this indictment for the offence of manslaughter. There was a considerable interval between the application of the liquid and the death of the patient; yet if you think that the infliction of the wound on the 10th of October was the cause of the death, then it is no answer to say that a different course of treatment by Mr. C. might have prevented it. You will consider these two points: first, of what did Mrs. L. die? You must be satisfied that she died of the wound, which was the result of the application made on the 10th of October; and then, secondly, if you are satisfied of this, whether the application was a felonious application; this will depend upon whether you think it was gross and culpable rashness in the prisoner to apply a remedy which might produce such effects in such a manner that it did actually produce them. If you think so then he will be answerable to the full extent.' (b)

Any person, whether he be a regularly licensed medical man or not, who professes to deal with the life or health of his Majesty's subjects, is bound to have competent skill to perform the task that he holds himself out to perform, and is bound to treat his patients with care, attention, and assiduity, and if the patient dies for want thereof, such medical man is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, by causing the death of a child by putting a plaster made of corrosive and dangerous ingredients upon its head, it appeared that the child for eighteen months had been afflicted with scald head, and was taken to the prisoner, who applied two plasters successively all over its head. Two surgeons proved that there was a general sloughing of the scalp, which caused the death, and in their opinion this might have been produced by the plasters; there was no evidence to show of what the plasters were composed. Bolland, B., 'The law, as I am bound to lay it down (and I believe I lay it down as it has been agreed upon by the judges; for cases of this kind have occurred of late more frequently than in former times) is this: if any person, whether he be a regular or licensed medical man or not, professes to deal with the life or health of his Majesty's subjects, he is bound to have competent skill to perform the task that he holds himself out to perform, and he is bound to treat his patients with care, attention, and assiduity.' (c)

The prisoner, a surgeon and man-midwife, was charged with manslaughter upon an indictment, which alleged that he undertook the care and charge of B. K. as a man-midwife, and to do everything needful for her during and after the time of her delivery, and that after B. K. was delivered he neglected to take proper care of and to render her proper assistance, by means whereof she died. Tindal, C. J., said to the jury, 'You are to say whether, in the execution of that duty which the prisoner had undertaken to perform, he is proved to have shown such a gross want of care, or such a gross and culpable want of skill, as any person undertaking such a charge ought not to be guilty of; and that the death of the person named in the indictment was caused thereby.' (d)

If a duly qualified medical man cause a death by the grossly unskilful, and grossly incautious use of a dangerous instrument, he is guilty of manslaughter.

If a medical man, though lawfully qualified to act as such, cause the death of a person by the grossly unskilful or grossly incautious use of a dangerous instrument, he is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment for manslaughter in causing the death of a woman by using a lever in delivering her of a child, it appeared that the prisoner had for nearly thirty years carried on the business of an apothecary and man-midwife, and that he was qualified by law to carry on that profession; his practice had been very considerable, and (amongst others) he had attended the deceased herself on the birth of all her children. On the occasion in question, he made use of a metal instrument, known in midwifery by the name of a vectis, or lever, inflicting thereby such grievous injuries on the person of the deceased, as to cause her death within three hours; and it was proved by the evidence of medical men, first, that the instrument used was a dangerous one, and that at that period of the labour it was very improper to use it at all; and secondly, that it must have been used in a very improper way, and in an entirely wrong direction. There was no evidence on either side as to whether the prisoner had or had not ever made use of such an instrument on former occasions. Coleridge, J., told the jury, that the questions for them to decide were, whether the instrument had in this instance caused the death of the deceased, and whether it had been used by the prisoner with due and proper skill and caution, or with gross want of skill, or gross want of attention. No man was justified in making use of an instrument, in itself a dangerous one, unless he did so with a proper degree of skill and caution. If the jury thought that in this instance the prisoner had used the instrument with gross want

He does not undertake, if he is an attorney, that at all events you shall gain your cause; nor does a surgeon undertake that he will perform a cure, nor does he undertake to use the highest possible degree of skill: there may be persons who have higher education and greater advantages than he has; but he undertakes to bring a fair, reasonable, and competent degree of skill.'

of skill, or gross want of caution, and that the deceased had thereby lost her life, it would be their duty to find the prisoner guilty. (e)

If a person brings a competent knowledge, and on a particular occasion makes an accidental mistake, he is not answerable; but if a person not acquainted with the medical art administers a dangerous remedy to a person labouring under a serious disease, proper medical assistance being at the time procurable, and death ensues from such administering, it is manslaughter. So if such person administers medicine, of the nature of which he is ignorant, and such medicine causes death. The prisoner was indicted for manslaughter in causing the death of R. R., by administering to him a large quantity of Morison's pills; the deceased, being ill of small-pox, had sent for the prisoner, who was a publican and agent for the sale of the pills, and under his advice had taken large quantities of them; his strength gradually wasted under their influence, and on the morning of his death, while in a state of collapse, the prisoner had, of his own accord, administered to him twenty pills. The prisoner had treated the deceased with great kindness during his illness, and on a former occasion the deceased had recovered from a dangerous illness while under the prisoner's treatment. Several medical men gave it as their opinion that medicine of the violent character, of which the pills were composed, could not be administered to a person in the state in which the deceased was, without accelerating his death. Lord Lyndhurst, C. B., 'I agree that in these cases there is no difference between a licensed physician or surgeon, and a person acting as physician or surgeon without a license. In either case, if a party, having a competent degree of skill and knowledge, makes an accidental mistake in his treatment of a patient, through which mistake death ensues, he is not thereby guilty of manslaughter; but if, where proper medical assistance can be had, a person totally ignorant of the science of medicine takes on himself to administer a violent and dangerous remedy to one labouring under disease, and death ensues in consequence of that dangerous remedy having been so administered, then he is guilty of manslaughter.' (f)

Where the prisoner, a herb doctor, gave a woman a bottle of lobelia inflata, and desired her to give two teaspoonfuls of the infusion three times a day to a child whom he examined, and she accordingly gave the child some doses of the infusion for several days, and then ceased, as she thought it got better; but the child died three weeks after it was seen by the prisoner, and more than a week after the last dose had been administered, and it was proved that the child had died of over-doses of lobelia, which is an acro-narcotic poison, and is occasionally used by regular practitioners; Pollock, C. B., told the jury that 'it is no crime for any one to administer medicine, but it is a crime to administer it so rashly and carelessly as to produce death; and in this respect there is no difference between the most regular practitioner and the greatest quack. All that the prisoner ought to be held responsible for was, what took place in the first week after he saw the child. The prisoner had not seen the child for three weeks before its death. The charge against the prisoner is, not that he carelessly allowed the woman to be in possession of a dangerous medicine, but that he caused the death of the child by administering the medicine; but in the evidence it appeared that the child got better while the medicine was being given to it. If the prisoner had been a medical man, I should have recommended you to take the most favourable view of his conduct; for it would be most fatal to the efficiency of the medical profession if none could administer medicine without a halter round his neck; and although I cannot speak of a person in the prisoner's position in language as strong, still he ought not to be responsible unless it has been proved with reasonable certainty that he caused the death by the careless administration of the drug.' (g)

If a party brings competent knowledge, and makes a mistake, he is not answerable; secus, if being grossly ignorant he applies a dangerous remedy, which causes death.

Where the deceased had once been operated upon for cancer, and the disease again appeared in his face, and the prisoner, a blacksmith, told him he could cure him, and the deceased consented to place himself in his hands, and he put some kind of oil on his face, and then applied some kind of powder which caused the greatest agony, and death ensued in nine days; and after the prisoner had been employed there was a line of demarcation around the tumour, and all the tissues were destroyed, as if some powerful caustic had been applied, and the general symptoms showed poisoning by some irritant poison; and on a post mortem examination, marks were found of extensive inflammation in the bowels and numerous ulcerations, which were the effects of mercury applied to the tumour; and the deceased died from the effects of corrosive sublimate. Corrosive sublimate was sometimes applied to wounds, but not to cancer. The deceased must have died of the cancer, but his death was accelerated. Watson, B., directed the jury to find the prisoner guilty if they considered he took upon himself the responsibility of attending to a patient suffering under cancer, when he was not qualified for the purpose. If he used dangerous applications, he was bound to bring skill in their use; and he thought that the prisoner's education and employment made the use of these dangerous substances almost amount to want of skill. The jury must, however, say whether what the prisoner did produced or accelerated the death; or (and) whether the prisoner in their opinion had acted with neglect in using the remedies he had done. (h)

Prussic acid case.

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner, a medical man, lived with his mother, and she being ill, he got a drachm of prussic acid, which filled one fourth of an ounce bottle. After she came in from a walk he gave her some of the prussic acid; she went upstairs, and, whilst taking off her bonnet, died. The prisoner said he had given her four drops, but it appeared that the bottle had lost much more. The cork however was broken, and the bottle was loose in his pocket. Very obscure evidence was given as to the relative strengths of different preparations of prussic acid, as to the mode of measuring drops, as to the quantities contained in drops, and as to the quantity likely to kill; but the cork being held partly in would much affect the quantity of a drop, and the state of a person's body might vary the effect of a few drops of the poison. Cockburn, C. J., told the jury that 'if a person takes upon himself to administer a dangerous medicine, it is his duty to administer it with proper care; and if he does it with negligence he is guilty of manslaughter. But do the facts here show such culpable negligence on the part of the prisoner? If the prisoner had given the deceased all that was missed from the bottle, it would be so, for the quantity would be so large that it must have been the grossest negligence. But the cork was found broken and half out of the bottle, so that it is impossible to say how much of the poison might not have escaped; or again, the cork being half gone, the liquid might have dropped faster than the prisoner supposed, and if so it would not be such culpable negligence as would make him criminally responsible.' (i)

Where a prisoner, who had formerly been a butcher by trade, had practised as a surgeon for many years without any legal qualification, was indicted for the manslaughter of a man on whom he had performed an operation for a disease in the bone, and the only question was whether the practice of the prisoner in the particular case amounted to gross and culpable negligence, and several medical men proved that the treatment pursued by the prisoner exhibited the grossest and most culpable ignorance, it was proposed for the defence to call witnesses to prove that the prisoner had treated them for similar complaints successfully, and Rex v. Williamson, (k) was relied upon. Maule, J., refused to allow the witnesses to be examined, saying. 'In Rex v. Williamson the witnesses were asked generally causâ scientiæ. Neither on the one hand nor the other can other cases be gone into. The attention of the jury must be confined to the present case.' And in summing up the very learned judge said, 'If a medical or any other man caused the death of another intentionally, that would be murder; but where a person not intending to kill a man, by his gross negligence, unskilfulness, and ignorance caused the death of another, then he was guilty of culpable homicide; and the question for the jury was, whether the deceased had died from the effects of the operation performed on him by the prisoner, and whether the treatment pursued by the prisoner in the case of the deceased was marked by negligence, unskilfulness, and ignorance.' (l)

Evidence of the manner in which the prisoner has treated other patients is not admissible.

A question is put by Lord Hale, whether, if a person infected with the plague should go abroad with the intention of infecting another, and another should thereby be infected and die, this would not be murder; but it is admitted that, if no such intention should evidently appear, it would not be felony, though a great misdemeanor. (m) It may be observed, that an offence of this sort in breach of quarantine is punishable by the provisions of a recent statute. (n)

may. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of a child under ten, and it appeared that he had had connection with her and given her the venereal disease; and Wightman, J., told the jury that if they were of opinion that the prisoner had had connection with her, and she died from its effects, then the act being, under the circumstances of the case, a felony in point of law, this would of itself be such malice as would justify them in finding him guilty of murder. (p)

Time of death.

It is agreed that no person shall be adjudged by any act whatever to kill another, who does not die thereof within a year and a day after the stroke received, or cause of death administered, in the computation of which the whole day upon which the hurt was done is to be reckoned the first. (q)

Treatment of wounds.

Questions may occasionally arise as to the treatment of the wound or hurt received by the party killed. Upon this subject it has been ruled, that if a man give another a stroke not in itself so mortal but that with good care he might be cured, yet if the party die of this wound within the year and day, it is murder, or other species of homicide, as the case may be; though if the wound or hurt be not mortal, and it shall be made clearly and certainly to appear that the death of the party was caused by ill applications by himself or those about him, of unwholesome salves or medicines, and not by the wound or hurt, it seems that this is no species of homicide. But when a wound not in itself mortal, for want of proper applications, or from neglect, turns to a gangrene or a fever, and that gangrene or fever is the immediate cause of the death of the party wounded, the party by whom the wound is given is guilty of murder, or manslaughter, according to the circumstances. For though the fever or gangrene, and not the wound, be the immediate cause of the death, yet the wound being the cause of the gangrene or fever, is the immediate cause of the death, causa causati. (r) Thus, it was resolved, that if one gives wounds to another, who neglects the cure of them, or is disorderly, and doth not keep that rule which a person wounded should do, yet if he die it is murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances; because if the wounds had not been, the man had not died; and, therefore, neglect or disorder in the person who received the wounds shall not excuse the person who gave them. (s) So where on an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased had been waylaid and assaulted by the prisoner and severely cut across one of his fingers by an iron instrument, and the surgeon urged him to submit to amputation, but he refused, though he was told that his life would be in great hazard; and it was dressed day by day for a fortnight; when lock-jaw came on induced by the wound in the finger, and the finger was then amputated, but too late; and the lock-jaw ultimately caused

(p) Reg. v. Greenwood, 7 Cox C. C. 404. The report proceeds, 'The jury retired, and, after some time, returned into Court, saying that they were satisfied that he had had connection, and that her death resulted therefrom, but were not agreed as to finding him guilty of murder. Wightman, J., told them that, under these circumstances, it was open to them to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and death; and the surgeon thought it most probable that the life would have been saved if the finger had been amputated in the first instance; and it was contended that it was the obstinate refusal to submit to amputation that was the cause of the death; Maule, J., held that that was no defence; and told the jury that if the prisoner wilfully, and without any justifiable cause, inflicted the wound, which was ultimately the cause of the death, he was guilty of murder; that for this purpose it made no difference whether the wound was in its own nature instantly mortal, or whether it became the cause of death by reason of the deceased not having adopted the best mode of treatment; the real question was whether in the end the wound was the cause of death. (t)

Where on an indictment against a principal in the second degree for murder by shooting in a duel, after the examination of the first medical witness, who stated his opinion that the operation (of which no account is given in the report) was the only chance of saving the life of the deceased; the counsel for the prisoner were proceeding to cross-examine him as to the nature and seat of the wound, to show that the opinions he had expressed of its danger and the necessity of the operation were not correct; Erle, J., said, 'I presume you propose to call counter-evidence and impeach the propriety of the operation; but I am clearly of opinion that if a dangerous wound is given, and the best advice is taken, and an operation performed under that advice, which is the immediate cause of death, the party giving the wound is criminally responsible.' It was proposed to show that the opinion formed by the medical men was grounded upon erroneous premises, and that no operation was necessary at all, or at least that an easier and much less dangerous operation ought to have been adopted; and it was submitted that a person is not criminally responsible where the death is caused by consequences which are not physically the consequences of the wound, but can only be connected with the first wound by moral reasonings; as here that which occasioned death was the operation, which supervened upon the wound, because the medical men thought it necessary. Erle, J., 'I am clearly of opinion, and so is my brother Rolfe, that where a wound is given, which, in the judgment of competent medical advisers, is dangerous, and the treatment which they bonâ fide adopt is the immediate cause of death, the party who inflicted the wound is criminally responsible, and of course those who aided and abetted him in it. I so rule on the present occasion; but it may be taken, for the purpose of future consideration, that it having been proved that there was a gunshot wound, and a pulsating tumour arising therefrom, which, in the bonâ fide opinion of competent medical men, was dangerous to life, and that they considered a certain operation necessary, which was skilfully performed, and was the immediate and proximate cause of death; the counsel for the prisoner tendered evidence to show this opinion was wrong, and that the wound would not have inevitably caused death, and that by other treatment the operation might have been avoided, and was therefore unnecessary. I will reserve this point for the consideration of the Judges, although I have no doubt upon the subject. To admit this evidence would be to raise a collateral issue in every case as to the degree of skill which the medical men possessed.' (u)

Where the deceased had been severely kicked on the stomach, and brandy had been given her by a surgeon to restore her, and part of it had gone the wrong way into the lungs, and might, peradventure, have caused the death, the prisoner was convicted of manslaughter, and Coleridge, J., said the case was like that where a dangerous wound was given, and an operation was performed. Killing a person labouring under disease.

If a man be sick of some disease, which, by the course of nature, might possibly end his life in half a year, and another gives him a wound or hurt which hastens his death, by irritating and provoking the disease to operate more violently or speedily, this is murder or other homicide, according to the circumstances, in the party by whom such wound or hurt was given. For the person wounded does not die simply ex visitatione Dei, but his death is hastened by the hurt which he received; and it shall not be permitted to the offender to apportion his own wrong. (w)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the death was caused by a blow on the back of the neck, and that the deceased was not at the time in a good state of health, and that she was desired to remain in a hospital, where she could best be attended to, but would not. Parke, B., said, 'It is said, that the deceased was in a bad state of health, but that is perfectly immaterial; as if the prisoner was so unfortunate as to accelerate her death, he must answer for it.' (x) So upon an indictment for manslaughter by administering Morison's pills, it appeared that they were administered whilst the deceased was ill of small-pox, and the medical witnesses all gave it as their opinion that the exhibition of Morison's pills in such doses must have aggravated the disease under which the deceased laboured, and have accelerated his death; and one of them said, that the deceased died of small-pox heightened by the treatment he had received. It was objected, that the indictment was not supported by the evidence, which only proved that the deceased died of a natural disorder, accelerated by improper treatment. It might be conceded, for the sake of argument, that if the indictment had so stated the case, it might have been sufficient; but the indictment made quite a different charge, viz., that the party died wholly and solely of a mortal sickness caused by the medicine and the improper treatment. Lord Lyndhurst, C. B., 'It is true the witnesses do not say whether the deceased would, in their opinion, have died of the small-pox if the pills had not been administered; but they all

(w) 1 Hale, 428. Lord Hale says, that thus he had heard that learned and wise judge, J. Rolle, frequently direct. See Johnson's case, 1 Lewin, 164, where on an indictment for manslaughter in causing a death by a blow on the stomach, on a surgeon stating that a blow on the stomach in this state of things, arising from passion and intoxication, was calculated to occasion death, but not so if the party was sober. Hullock, B., is said to have directed an acquittal, saying, 'that where the death was occasioned partly by a blow, and partly by a predisposing circumstance, it was impossible so to apportion the operations of the several causes as to be able to say with certainty that the death was immediately occasioned by any one of them in particular.' This ruling is questioned in Roscoe Cr. Evid. 647, and as it should seem with very good reason, as it is contrary to the other authorities upon this point. C. S. G.

agree in this, that his death was accelerated by the pills. Now their evidence being translated, comes to this, that the party died on the day when he did die, viz., on the 27th of June, by reason of taking the pills. At present, therefore, it appears to me that the indictment is good.' And, in summing up, the very learned Chief Baron adhered to the opinion he had already expressed on the argument, and left it to the jury to say, 'whether the death of the deceased had been occasioned or accelerated by the medicines administered by the prisoner.' (y)

So where a husband was indicted for the manslaughter of his wife by accelerating her death by blows, and it appeared that she was at the time in so bad a state of health that she could not possibly have lived more than a month or six weeks under any circumstances; Coleridge, J., told the jury that if a person inflicted an injury upon a person labouring under a mortal disease, which caused that person to die sooner than he otherwise would have done, he was liable to be found guilty of manslaughter, and the question for them was whether the death of the wife was caused by the disease under which she was labouring, or whether it was hastened by the ill usage of the prisoner. (z)

It will not be necessary to specify the particular instances of the more gross kinds of wilful murder in which the malignity of the heart, the malice prepense which has been already described, is apparent. It may, however, be remarked, that of all species of deaths, that by poison has been considered as the most detestable, because it can, of all others, be least prevented by manhood or forethought. It is a deliberate act, necessarily implying malice, however great the provocation may have been; (a) and on account of its singular enormity was made treason by the 22 Hen. 8, c. 9, and punishable by a lingering kind of death; but this statute was repealed by the 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, ss. 10 & 13. (b) By a late statute administering poison with intent to murder, though no death should ensue, is made highly penal, which will be more particularly mentioned in its proper place. (c)

Self-murder may be mentioned as a peculiar instance of malice directed to the destruction of a man's own life, by inducing him deliberately to put an end to his existence, or to commit some unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death. (d) It has been already stated, that a person killing another, upon his desire or command, is guilty of murder, (e) but

(b) The true grounds of this statute of Edw. 6, which was repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, have been much discussed, and different opinions have been expressed on the subject by many great lawyers. See the opinions of Lord Coke, 11 Co. 32 a.; Kelyng, C. J., Kel. 32; Lord Holt, Kel. 125; and Mr. Just. Foster, 68, 69. Mr. Justice Foster considered the enactments of the statute to be not in affirmance of the common law, but by way of revival of it; to this solution of the difficulty Mr. Barrington has made some objections, (Obs. on the Stat. 524) which have been observed upon by the editor of Mr. Just. Foster's work, in his Preface to the second edition.

in this case the person killed is not looked upon as a felo de se, inasmuch as his assent, being against the laws of God and man, was void. (f) But where two persons agree to die together, and one of them, at the persuasion of the other, buys poison and mixes it in a potion, and both drink of it, and he who bought and made the potion survives by using proper remedies, and the other dies; it is said to be the better opinion, that he who dies shall be adjudged a felo de se, because all that happened was originally owing to his own wicked purpose, and the other only put it in his power to execute it in that particular manner. (g) Upon a principle which will presently be mentioned more fully, if a man, attempting to kill another, miss his blow and kill himself, (h) or intending to shoot at another, mortally wound himself by the bursting of the gun, (i) he is felo de se; his own death being the consequence of an unlawful malicious act towards another. It has also been said, that if A. strike B. to the ground, and B. draw a knife and hold it up for his own defence, and A. in haste falling upon B. to kill him, fall upon the knife and be thereby killed, A. is felo de se; (k) but this has been doubted. (l) A husband and wife being in extreme poverty and great distress of mind, the husband said, 'I am weary of life, and will destroy myself,' upon which the wife replied, 'If you do I will too.' The man bought some poison, mixed it with some drink, and they both partook of it. The husband died, but the wife, by drinking salad oil, which caused sickness, recovered, and was tried for the murder of her husband, and acquitted, but solely on the ground that, being the wife of the deceased, she was under his control; and inasmuch as the proposal to commit suicide had been first suggested by him, it was considered that she was not a free agent, and therefore the jury, under the direction of the judge who tried the case, pronounced a verdict of not guilty. (m)

If a man encourages another to murder himself, and is present abetting him while he does so, such man is guilty of murder as a principal.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of a woman by drowning her. It appeared that the prisoner had cohabited with the deceased for several months previous to her death, and she was with child by him; they were in a state of extreme distress; and being unable to pay for their lodgings, they quitted them in the evening of the night on which the deceased was drowned, and had no place of shelter. They passed the evening together at the theatre, and afterwards went to Westminster Bridge to drown

themselves in the Thames; they got into a boat, and from that into another boat, the water where the first boat was moored not being of sufficient depth to drown them. They talked together for some time in the boat into which they had got, the prisoner standing with his foot on the edge of the boat, and the woman leaning upon him. The prisoner then found himself in the water; but whether by actual throwing of himself in, or by accident, did not appear. He struggled to get back into the boat again, and then found that the woman was gone; he then endeavoured to save her, but could not get to her, and she was drowned. In his statement before the magistrate he said that he intended to drown himself, but dissuaded the woman from following his example. The learned Judge told the jury, that if they believed that the prisoner only intended to drown himself, and not that the woman should die with him, they should acquit the prisoner; but that if both went to the water for the purpose of drowning themselves together, each encouraged the other in the commission of a felonious act, and the survivor was guilty of murder. He also told the jury, that although the indictment charged the prisoner with throwing the deceased into the water, yet if he were present at the time she threw herself in, and consented to her doing it, the act of throwing was to be considered as the act of both, and so the case was reached by the indictment. The jury stated that they were of opinion that both the prisoner and the deceased went to the water for the purpose of drowning themselves, and the prisoner was convicted. And, upon a case reserved, the Judges were clear that if the deceased threw herself into the water by the encouragement of the prisoner, and because she thought he had set her the example in pursuance of their previous agreement, he was a principal in the second degree, and was guilty of murder; but as it was doubtful whether the deceased did not fall in by accident, it was not murder in either of them, and the prisoner was recommended for a pardon. (n) So where upon an indictment for the murder of a woman, it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased, who passed as husband and wife, being in very great distress, both agreed to take poison, and each took a quantity of laudanum, in the presence of the other, and both lay down on the same bed together, wishing to die in each other's arms, and the woman died, but the prisoner recovered; Patteson, J., told the jury that, 'supposing the parties in this case mutually agreed to commit suicide, and one only accomplished that object, the survivor will be guilty of murder in point of law. It may be said that they were both under the influence of what is called "temporary insanity," and a practice has of late years been pursued by coroners' juries of finding verdicts to that effect in cases which do not at all justify such a conclusion. As a lawyer, I am bound to say that such verdicts are wholly unwarranted by the law of this country.' (o)

If two encourage each other to murder themselves together, and one does so but the other fails in the attempt upon himself, he is a principal in the murder of the other.

A person could not formerly be tried, as an accessory before the fact, for inciting another to commit suicide, if that person committed suicide. (p) But the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, seems to remove this difficulty. (q)

Of aiders and abettors. How far an abettor must be present at the commission of the crime.

In order to make an abettor to a murder or manslaughter principal in the felony, he must be present aiding and abetting the fact committed. The presence, however, need not always be an actual standing by within sight or hearing of the fact; for there may be a constructive presence, as when one commits a murder and another keeps watch or guard at some convenient distance. (r) But a person may be present, and, if not aiding and abetting, be neither principal nor accessory: as, if A. happen to be present at a murder and take no part in it, nor endeavour to prevent it, or to apprehend the murderer, this strange behaviour, though highly criminal, will not of itself render him either principal or accessory. (s)

Persons present may be guilty of different degrees of homicide.

If several persons are present at the death of a man, they may be guilty of different degrees of homicide, as one of murder and another of manslaughter; for if there be no malice in the party striking, but malice in an abettor, it will be murder in the latter, though only manslaughter in the former. (t) So if A. assault B. of malice and they fight, and A.'s servant come in aid of his master, and B. be killed, A. is guilty of murder; but the servant, if he knew not of A.'s malice, is guilty of manslaughter only. (u) Several persons conspired to kill Dr. Ellis, and they set upon him accordingly, when Salisbury, who was a servant to one of them, seeing the affray and fighting on both sides, joined with his master, but knew nothing of his master's design. A servant of Dr. Ellis, who supported his master, was killed. The Court told the jury that malice against Dr. Ellis would make it murder in all those whom that malice affected, as the malice against Dr. Ellis would imply malice against all who opposed the design against Dr. Ellis: but, as to Salisbury, if he had no malice, but took part suddenly with those who had, without knowing of the design against Dr. Ellis, it was only manslaughter in him. The jury found Salisbury guilty of manslaughter and three others of murder, and the three were executed. (v)

It has been decided that if the person charged as principal be acquitted, a conviction of another charged in the indictment as present aiding and abetting him in the murder, is good: for (by Holt, C. J.) though the indictment be against the prisoner for aiding, assisting, and abetting A., who was acquitted, yet the indictment and trial of this prisoner is well enough, for all are principals, and it is not material who actually did the murder. (w) And though anciently the person who gave the fatal stroke was considered as the principal, and those who were present aiding and assisting, only as accessories; yet it has long been settled that all who are present aiding and assisting are equally principals with him who gave the stroke whereof the party died, though they are called principals in the second degree. (x) So that if A. be indicted for murder, or manslaughter, and C. and D. for being present and assisting A., and A. appears not, but C. and D. appear, they shall be arraigned; and if convicted shall receive judgment, though A. neither appear nor be outlawed. (y) And if A. be indicted as having given the mortal stroke, and B. and C. as present, aiding and assisting, and upon the evidence it appears that B. gave the stroke, and A. and C. were only aiding and assisting, it maintains the indictment, and judgment shall be given against them all; for it is only a circumstantial variance, and in law it is the stroke of all that were present aiding and abetting. Cooper by shooting him with a gun, and Powys as being present aiding and abetting Downing, and the second count charged Powys as principal in the first degree, alleging that he 'afterwards' assaulted 'the said W. Cooper,' &c., and Downing as being present aiding and abetting Powys; and the jury found both guilty, but added that they were not satisfied which of the prisoners fired the gun, but were satisfied that one of them fired the gun, and that the other was present aiding and abetting: it was thereupon submitted that, the prisoners being charged differently in the two counts, the jury must be instructed to find them guilty on one or the other of the counts only; but Coltman, J., thought that, as the evidence equally supported either count, it was not necessary to give any such direction, and therefore told them that if they were satisfied that one of the two fired the gun, and that the other was present aiding and abetting, they were both liable to be found guilty, and the jury returned a general verdict of guilty; and, upon a case reserved, the conviction was held right, for both counts substantially related to the same person killed and to one killing. when they assembled together and armed themselves; because, if their object was to resist all opposers in the commission of any breach of the peace, and for that purpose the parties assembled together and armed themselves with dangerous weapons, however blank the mind of Thom might be as to any ulterior purpose, and however the minds of the prisoners might be unconscious of any particular object, still, if they contemplated a resistance to the lawfully-constituted authorities of the country, in case any should come against them while they were so banded together, there would be a common purpose, and they would be answerable for anything which they did in the execution of it. (c)

He that counsels, commands, or directs the killing of any person, and is himself absent at the time of the fact being done, is an accessory to murder before the fact. (d) And though the crime be done by the intervention of a third person, he that procures it to be committed is an accessory before the fact; so that if A. bid his servant to hire somebody, no matter whom, to murder B. and furnish him with money for that purpose, and the servant procure C., a person whom A. never saw or heard of, to do it, A. is an accessory before the fact. (e)

If A. advise B. to kill another, and B. does it in the absence of A., in such case B. is principal, and A. is accessory in the murder. And this holds, even though the party killed be not in rerum naturâ at the time of the advice given; so that if a man advise a woman to kill her child as soon as it shall be born, and she kills it when born in pursuance of such advice, he is an accessory to the murder. (f)

the direct and immediate effect of the command or counsel of the accessory.

It is a rule, that he who in any wise commands or counsels another to commit an unlawful act, is accessory to all that ensues upon that unlawful act. Thus, if A. commands B. to beat C., and B. beat him so that he dies, A. being absent, B. is guilty of murder as principal, and A. as accessory; the crime having been committed in the execution of a command which naturally tended to endanger the life of another. (g) And à fortiori, therefore, if a man command another to rob any person, and he in robbing kill him, the person giving such command is as much an accessory to the murder, as to the robbery which was directly commanded: and it is also said, that if one command a man to rob another, and he kill him in the attempt but do not rob him, the person giving such command is guilty of the murder, because it was the direct and immediate effect of an act done in execution of a command to commit a felony. (h)

Batty at Paris, and the prisoner as accessory before the fact, and it appeared that when the Emperor and Empress of the French arrived at the opera-house in the Rue Lepelletier, Paris, the street being full of people, as the carriage approached the entrance two grenades were first thrown and exploded, and a third about a minute afterwards, and that Batty was one of the Gardes de Paris on duty at the time, and that he died of wounds caused by the explosion; Lord Campbell, C. J., after citing 1 Russ. C. & M., (i) told the grand jury, 'as to the objection that the prisoner could have had no intention that those who were killed by the explosion of the grenades should be put to death, it may be observed that such a question can only arise where the principal does not act in strict conformity with the plans and instructions of the accessory. But here, if the prisoner was privy to the plot, the other persons in throwing the grenades as they did must be considered as having acted strictly in conformity with his plans and instructions, and he is answerable as accessory for the consequences.' And after citing 1 Russ. C. & M., (k) his Lordship added: 'The approved test is, "was the event alleged to be the crime to which the accused is charged to be accessory, a probable consequence of the act he committed?"' (l)

But if the crime committed be not the direct and immediate effect of the act done in pursuance of the command, or if the act done varies in substance from that which was commanded, the party giving the command cannot be deemed an accessory to the crime. Thus if A. persuade B. to poison C., and B. accordingly give poison to C., who eats part of it, and gives the rest to D., who is killed by it, A. is guilty of a great misdemeanor only in respect of D., but is not an accessory to his murder: because it was not the direct and immediate effect of the act done in pursuance of the command. (m) And if A. counsel or command B. to beat C. with a small wand or rod, which would not in all human reason cause death, and B. beat C. with a great club, or wound him with a sword, whereof he dies, it seems that A. is not accessory; because there was no command of death, nor of anything that could probably cause death; and B. departed from the command in substance, and not in circumstance. (n) But if the crime committed be the same in substance with that which was commanded, and vary only in some circumstantial matters; as where a man advises another to kill a person in the night, and he kills him in the day; or to kill him in the fields, and he kills him in the town; or to poison him, and he stabs or shoots him; the person giving such command is still accessory to the murder; for the substance of the thing commanded was the death of the party killed, and the manner of its execution is a mere collateral circumstance. (o)

An accessory after the fact, in murder, as in any other felony, may be where a person, knowing a murder to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the offender; as to which kind of accessory some points are noticed in a former chapter. person, knowing the offence had been committed, was either assisting the murderer to conceal the death, or in any way enabling him to evade the pursuit of justice. (q) It may be here observed, however, that if one wounds another mortally, and after the wound given, but before death ensues, a person assists or receives the delinquent, this does not make such person accessory to the homicide; for till death ensues there is no felony committed. [513]

It has been before submitted, that a statement of the several instances of gross and direct wilful murder cannot be thought necessary. But there are a variety of cases of a less decided character, and some upon which doubts have arisen, which may properly be here considered. An apt arrangement of them is a matter of some difficulty; but the following order seems to be appropriate: I. Cases of provocation. II. Cases of mutual combat. III. Cases of resistance to officers of justice, to persons acting in their aid, and to private persons lawfully interfering to apprehend felons, or to prevent a breach of the peace. IV. Cases where the killing takes place in the prosecution of some other criminal,

(s) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 2; and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3 (1). Petit Treason was a breach of the lower allegiance of private and domestic faith; and considered as proceeding from the same principle of treachery in private life as would have led the person harbouring it to have conspired in public against his liege lord and sovereign. At common law the instances of this kind of crime were somewhat numerous and involved in some uncertainty, 1 Hale, 376; but, by the 25 Edw. 3, st. 5, c. 2, they were reduced to the following cases:—1. Where a servant killed his master. 2. Where a wife killed her husband. 3. Where an ecclesiastical person, secular or regular, killed his superior, to whom he owed faith and obedience. The principles relating to wilful murder were also applicable to the crime of petit treason, which, though it appears to have been sometimes regarded differently, [by many people, as Mr. J. Foster says, Fost. 323] was substantially the same offence as murder, differing only in degree. [Fost. 323, 327, 336. 4 Blac. Com. 203.] It was murder aggravated by the circumstance of the allegiance, however low, which the murderer owed to the deceased; and in consequence of that circumstance of aggravation, and of that alone, the judgment upon a conviction was more grievous in one case than in the other; though in common practice no material difference was made in the manner of the execution. As the offence of petit treason is now rendered the same as murder, the course is always to indict for murder, and it has therefore been thought unnecessary to reprint the chapter on Petit Treason, which was in the former editions. unlawful, or wanton act. V. Cases where the killing takes place in consequence of some lawful act being criminally or improperly performed, or of some act performed without lawful authority.

SEC. I.

Cases of Provocation.

As the indulgence which is shown by the law in some cases to the first transport of passion is a condescension to the frailty of the human frame, to the furor brevis, which, while the frenzy lasts, renders a man deaf to the voice of reason; so the provocation which is allowed to extenuate in the case of homicide must be something which a man is conscious of, which he feels and resents at the instant the fact which he would extenuate is committed. (t) All the circumstances of the case must lead to the conclusion, that the act done, though intentional of death or great bodily harm, was not the result of a cool deliberate judgment and previous malignity of heart, but solely imputable to human infirmity. (u) For there are many trivial, and some considerable provocations, which are not permitted to extenuate an act of homicide, or rebut the conclusion of malice, to which the other circumstances of the case may lead.

No breach of a man's word or promise; no trespass, either to lands or goods; no affront by bare words or gestures, however false and malicious, and aggravated with the most provoking circumstances, will free the party killing from the guilt of murder. (v) And it is conceived that this rule will govern every case where the party killing upon such provocation makes use of a deadly weapon, or otherwise manifests an intention to kill, or to do some great bodily harm. (w)

Words, gestures, &c.

A. passing by the shop of B. distorted his mouth, and smiled at him, and B. killed him: this was held murder; for it was no such provocation as would abate the presumption of malice in the party killing. (x)

Dangerfield was sentenced for a gross libel to be flogged from Newgate to Tyburn, and as he was returning from Tyburn, Frances, a barrister, asked him, in a jeering way, whether he had run his heat that day; he replied in scurrilous words; whereon Frances ran him into the eye with a small cane in his hand, and of this wound Dangerfield died, and Frances was executed for his murder. (y)

Frances' case.

If A. be passing along the street, and B. meeting him (there being a convenient distance between A. and the wall) take the wall of him, and thereupon A. kill B., this is a murder; but if B. had justled A., this justling had been a provocation, and would have made it manslaughter. (z)

If there be a chiding between husband and wife, and the husband strike his wife thereupon with a pestle, so that she dies presently, it is murder; and the chiding will not be a provocation to extenuate it to manslaughter. (a)

A woman called a man, who was sitting drinking in an alehouse, ‘a son of a whore,’ upon which the man took up a broomstaff, and at a distance threw it at her and killed her; and it was propounded to the Judges whether this was murder or manslaughter. Two questions were made, 1. Whether bare words, or words of this nature, would amount to such a provocation as would extenuate the fact into manslaughter. 2. Admitting that they would not, in case there had been a striking with such an instrument as necessarily would have caused death, as stabbing with a sword or shooting with a pistol; yet whether this striking, so improbable to cause death, would not alter the case. The Judges were not unanimous upon this case; and a pardon was recommended. (b)

If, without adequate provocation, a person strikes another with a deadly weapon, likely to occasion death, although he had no previous malice against the party, yet he is to be presumed to have had such malice at the moment from the circumstances, and he is guilty of murder. (c) Where, therefore, a boy, twelve years old, who had been in the habit of going to a cooper’s shop and taking away chips, was told one morning by the cooper’s apprentice not to come again; he however went again in the afternoon, and the apprentice spread his arms out to prevent his reaching the spot where he usually gathered the chips, on which the boy started off, and in passing a work bench, took up a whittle (a sharp-pointed steel knife with a long handle) and threw it at the apprentice, and the blade of the whittle entered his body, to the depth of four inches, and caused his death; the jury having found him guilty upon an indictment for manslaughter; Hullock, B., observed, that had he been indicted for murder, the evidence would have sustained the charge. (d) So where on an indictment for wounding it appeared that Withy and two women met the prisoner at midnight on the highway, and some words passed between them; when Withy struck the prisoner, who then made a blow with a knife, it was held that unless the prisoner apprehended robbery or some similar offence, or danger to life or some serious bodily harm, not simply being knocked down, he would not be justified in using the knife in self-defence. (e)

Words of menace.

In a case where it was decided that if A. give slighting words to B., and B. thereupon immediately kill him, such killing would be murder in B., it is also stated to have been holden, that words of menace or bodily harm would amount to such a provocation as would reduce the offence of killing to manslaughter. (f) But it should be observed, that in another report of the same case this latter position is not to be found. (g) And it seems that such words ought at least to be accompanied by some act, denoting an immediate intention of following them up by an actual assault. (h)

Though an assault made with violence or circumstances of indignity upon a man's person, and resented immediately by the party acting in the heat of blood upon that provocation, and killing the aggressor, will reduce the crime to manslaughter, yet it must by no means be understood that the crime will be so extenuated by any trivial provocation which in point of law may amount to an assault; nor in all cases even by a blow. (i) Violent acts of resentment, bearing no proportion to the provocation or insult, are barbarous, proceeding rather from brutal malignity than human frailty; and barbarity will often make malice. (k)

Assault.

If a person kill another under the influence of provocation occasioned by a blow, accompanied by very aggravating language, if the blow were by itself insufficient to reduce the crime to manslaughter, possibly the aggravating language may be taken into consideration together with the blow, and amount to such a provocation as will reduce the offence to manslaughter. Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that upon the evening before the death the prisoner and the deceased had been quarrelling, and that the deceased had used very aggravating language, as well as very indecent and insulting gestures to the prisoner. The deceased was found dead the next morning with a wound in the throat, which had caused her death, and had been inflicted by some sharp instrument, such as a razor. Within a short distance of the deceased there was lying a sweeping-brush in such a position that it might be supposed to have fallen from the hand of the deceased, supposing that a scuffle had taken place before the fatal wound had been inflicted. Pollock, C. B., in summing up said, 'It is true that no provocation by words only will reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter; but it is equally true that every provocation by blows will not have this effect, particularly when, as in this case, the prisoner appears to have resented the blow by using a weapon calculated to cause death. Still, however, if there be a provocation by blows, which would not of itself render the killing manslaughter, but it be accompanied by such provocation by means of words and gestures as would be calculated to produce a degree of exasperation equal to that which would be produced by a violent blow, I am not prepared to say that the law will not regard these circumstances as reducing the crime to that of manslaughter only.' (l)

Where a person kills another under the provocation of a blow, semble, that aggravating language and insulting gestures may be taken into consideration together with the blow.

There being an affray in the street, one Stedman, a foot soldier, ran hastily towards the combatants. A woman, seeing him run in that manner, cried out, 'You will not murder the man, will you?' Stedman replied, 'What is that to you, you bitch?' The woman thereupon gave him a box on the ear, and Stedman struck her on the breast with the pommel of his sword. The woman then fled; and Stedman, pursuing her, stabbed her in the back. It seemed to Holt, C. J., that this was murder, a single box on the ear from a woman not being a sufficient provocation to kill in such a manner, after Stedman had given her a blow in return for the box on the ear; and it was proposed to have the matter found specially; but it afterwards appearing, in the progress of the trial, that the woman struck the soldier in the face with an iron patten, and drew a great deal of blood, it was holden clearly to be no more than manslaughter. (m) The smart of the man's wound, and the effusion of blood, might possibly have kept his indignation boiling to the moment of the fact. (n)

Tranter's case.

Mr. Lutterel, being arrested for a small debt, prevailed on one of the officers to go with him to his lodgings, while the other was sent to fetch the attorney's bill, in order, as Lutterel pretended, to have the debt and costs paid. Words arose at the lodgings about civility money, which Lutterel refused to give; and he went up stairs, pretending to fetch money for the payment of the debt and costs, leaving the officer below. He soon returned with a brace of loaded pistols in his bosom; which, at the importunity of his servant, he laid down upon the table, saying, 'He did not intend to hurt the officers; but he would not be ill used.' The officer, who had been sent for the attorney's bill, soon returned to his companion at the lodgings; and words of anger arising, Lutterel struck one of the officers on the face with a walking cane, and drew a little blood. Whereupon both of them fell upon him; one stabbed him in nine places, he all the while on the ground, begging for mercy, and unable to resist them; and one of them fired one of the pistols at him while on the ground, and gave him his death wound. And this is reported to have been holden manslaughter by reason of the first assault with the cane. (o) 'This (says Mr. J. Foster) is the case as reported by Sir John Strange; and an extraordinary case it is; that all these circumstances of aggravation, two to one, he helpless and on the ground, begging for mercy, stabbed in nine places, and then despatched with a pistol; that all these circumstances, plain indications of a deadly revenge or diabolical fury, should not outweigh a slight stroke with a cane.' (p)

If A. overpower B. in a fight, and then strangle him, it is murder.

If two persons fight, and one overpower the other, and knock him down, and then strangle him with a rope, this is murder. Upon an indictment for murder by strangling, it appeared that the prisoner had said, 'We quarrelled about some money I had won from him; he wanted it back, and I would not give it to him; he struck me, and I knocked him down; he got up, and I knocked him down again, and kicked him, and then I put a rope round his neck, and dragged him into the ditch.' Patteson, J., said to the jury, 'if you even believe the prisoner's statement, that will not prevent the crime from being murder, and reduce it to manslaughter. If two persons fight, and one of them overpowers the other, and knocks him down, and then puts a rope round his neck, and strangles him, that is murder. The act is so wilful and deliberate that nothing can justify it.' (q)

As an assault, though illegal, will not reduce the crime of the party killing the person assaulting him to manslaughter, where the revenge is disproportionate and barbarous, much less will such personal restraint and coercion as one man may lawfully use towards another form any ground of extenuation. Two soldiers came at eleven o'clock at night to a publican's, and demanded beer, which he refused, alleging the unseasonableness of the hour, and advised them to go to their quarters; whereupon they went away, uttering imprecations. In an hour and a half afterwards, when the door was opened to let out some company, who had been detained there on business, one of them rushed in, the other remaining without, and renewed his demand for beer; to which the landlord returned the same answer; and on his refusing to depart, and persisting to have some beer, and offering to lay hold of the landlord, the latter at the same instant collared him; the one pushing and the other pulling each other towards the outer door; where when the landlord came he received a violent blow on the head with some sharp instrument from the other soldier, who had remained without, which occasioned his death a few days afterwards. Buller, J., held this to be murder in both, notwithstanding the previous struggle between the landlord and one of them. For the landlord did no more in attempting to put the soldier out of his house at that time of the night, and after the warning he had given him, than he lawfully might; which was no provocation for the cruel revenge taken; more especially as there was reasonable evidence of the prisoners having come the second time with a deliberate intention to use personal violence, in case their demand for beer was not complied with. (r)

If A. stands with an offensive weapon in the doorway of a room wrongfully to prevent J. S. from leaving it, and others from entering, and C., who has right in the room, struggles with him to get his weapon from him; upon which D., a comrade of A.'s, stabs C., it will be murder in D. if C. dies. A drummer and a private soldier stopped at an inn with a deserter, and were pressed by one Martin to enlist him; and they gave him a shilling for that purpose, but they had no authority to enlist anybody. Martin wanted afterwards to go away; but they would not let him, and a crowd collected. The drummer drew his sword, stood in the doorway of the room where they were, and swore he would stab anyone who offered to go away. The landlord, however, got by him; and the landlord's son seized his arm in which the sword was, and was wresting the sword from him, when the private, who had been struggling with Martin, came behind the son, and stabbed him in the back. He was indicted upon the statute 43 G. 3, and it was urged for the prisoner, that the soldiers had a right to enlist Martin, and to detain him; and that if death had ensued, the offence would not have been murder; but, upon the point being saved, the Judges were all of a contrary opinion. (s)

Provocation of a slighter kind—mode of resentment—and nature of instruments used.

If on sudden slight provocation A. beat B. in a cruel manner, it is murder.

In cases of provocation of a slighter kind, not amounting to an assault, as the ground of extenuation would be that the act of resentment, which has unhappily proved fatal, did not proceed from malice, or a spirit of revenge, but was intended merely for correction; so the material inquiry will be, whether malice must be inferred from the sort of punishment inflicted, from the nature of the instrument used, and from the manner of the chastisement. (t) For if, on any sudden provocation of a slight nature, one person beat another in a cruel and unusual manner, so that he dies, it is murder by express malice; though the person so beating the other did not intend to kill him. (u)

Thus the case which has been before mentioned, where, upon a chiding between husband and wife, the husband struck his wife with a pestle, (v) proceeded upon the ground of the pestle being an instrument likely to endanger life. (w) And it is probable that the doubt which was felt by some of the Judges in a case where a man, upon being called by a woman 'a son of a whore,' took up a broomstaff and threw it at her, and killed her, (x) arose from the consideration that the instrument was not such as was likely, when thrown from the given distance, to have occasioned death, or great bodily harm. (y)

Aggravation, though not constituting an extenuation of a deadly blow, may palliate a moderate blow.

And in order to negative malice, in a case where death has ensued from a blow not likely to have produced death, or mortal disease, all circumstances of aggravation (though not sufficient to warrant giving a deadly blow) will be material. One Freeman, a soldier, was in a public-house drinking, and asked a girl who was sitting there to drink with him: upon which one Ann Simpson, with whom he had cohabited, seized his pot, abused him very much, and threw down his beer. Freeman then caught the pot from her, and struck her twice on the head with it: the blood gushed out, and she was taken to a hospital, where the wound was examined, and did not appear dangerous, being about a quarter of an inch deep: but it produced an erisypelas, which caused an inflammation of the brain, and the woman died. The witness, who saw the blows, did not think the prisoner intended to do the woman any grievous bodily harm. Gibbs, C. B., told the jury, that if the disease which caused the death originated from the wound, it was the same as if the wound had caused the death; that the primary cause was to be considered; that the aggravation, though not constituting a provocation which would extenuate the giving a deadly blow, would palliate the giving a moderate blow; and he left it to the jury whether those blows were such as were likely to be followed by death, or by a disease likely to terminate in death. The jury thought that the blows were not of this kind, and the prisoner was found guilty of manslaughter only. (z)

the following case:—The prisoner's son fought with another boy, and was beaten; he ran home to his father all bloody, who presently took a cudgel, ran three quarters of a mile, and struck the other boy upon the head, upon which he died. (a). This was ruled manslaughter, because done in a sudden heat and passion; but upon this case Mr. J. Foster makes the following remarks: (b) 'Surely the provocation was not very grievous. The boy had fought with one who happened to be an over-match for him, and was worsted; a disaster slight enough, and very frequent among boys. If upon this provocation the father, after running three quarters of a mile, had set his strength against the child, had despatched him with a hedge stake, or any other deadly weapon, or by repeated blows with his cudgel, it must, in my opinion, have been murder; since any of these circumstances would have been a plain indication of malice; but with regard to these circumstances, with what weapon, or to what degree, the child was beaten, Coke is totally silent. But Croke (c) sets the case in a much clearer light, and at the same time leads his readers into the true grounds of the judgment. His words are, "Rowley struck the child with a small cudgel, of which stroke he afterwards died." I think it may be fairly collected from Croke's manner of speaking, and Godbolt's report, (d) that the accident happened by a single stroke with a cudgel not likely to destroy, and that death did not immediately ensue. The stroke was given in heat of blood, and not with any of the circumstances which import malice, and therefore manslaughter. I observe that Lord Raymond lays great stress on this circumstance: that the stroke was with a cudgel, not likely to kill.' (e)

Where upon a special verdict it was found that the prisoner, having employed her daughter-in-law, a child of ten years old, to reel some yarn, and finding some of the skeins knotted threw at the child a four-legged stool, which struck her on the right side of the head on the temple, and caused her death soon after the blow so given; and the stool was of sufficient size and weight to give a mortal blow, but the prisoner did not intend, at the time she threw the stool, to kill the child; the matter was considered as of great difficulty, and no opinion was ever delivered by the Judges. (f) The doubt appears to have been principally upon the question, whether the instrument was such as would probably, at the given distance, have occasioned death or great bodily harm. (g)

Hazel's case.

Where A. finding a trespasser upon his land, in the first transport of his passion, beat him and unluckily killed him, and it was holden to be manslaughter, (h) it must be understood that he beat the trespasser, not with a mischievous intention, but merely to chastise him, and to deter him from a future commission of such a trespass. For if A. had knocked his brains out with a bill or hedge stake, or had killed him by an outrageous beating with an ordinary cudgel, beyond the bounds of a sudden resentment, it would have been murder; these circumstances being some of the genuine symptoms of the mala mens, the heart bent upon mischief, which enter into the true notion of malice in the legal sense of the word. (i) Moir having been greatly annoyed by persons trespassing upon his farm, repeatedly gave notice that he would shoot anyone who did so, and at length discharged a pistol at a person who was trespassing, and wounded him in the thigh, which led to erysipelas, and the man died: he was convicted of murder, and executed. (k)

It seems, therefore, that it may be laid down, that in all cases of slight provocation, if it may be reasonably collected from the weapon made use of, or from any other circumstance, that the party intended to kill, or to do some great bodily harm, such homicide will be murder. Accordingly, where a parker, finding a boy stealing wood in his master's ground, bound him to his horse's tail and beat him, and the horse taking fright, and running away, the boy was dragged on the ground till his shoulder was broken, whereof he died; it was ruled murder: for it was not only an illegal, but a deliberate and dangerous act; the correction was excessive, and savoured of cruelty. (l)

It should be further remembered, upon the grounds which have been before mentioned, (m) that the plea of provocation will not avail where there is evidence of express malice. (n) In such case not even previous blows or struggling will extenuate homicide.

The prisoner, with the deceased, who was his brother, and some neighbours, were drinking in a friendly manner at a public-house; till growing warm in liquor, but not intoxicated, the prisoner and the deceased began in idle sport to pull and push each other about the room. They then wrestled; one fell, and soon afterwards they played at cudgels by agreement. All this time no token of anger appeared on either side, till the prisoner in the cudgel-play gave the deceased a smart blow on the temple. The deceased thereupon grew angry; and throwing away his cudgel, closed in with the prisoner, and they fought a short space in good earnest: but the company interposing, they were soon parted. The prisoner then quitted the room in anger; and when he got into the street, was heard to say, 'Damnation seize me if I do not fetch something, and stick him!' And being reproved for using such expressions, he answered, 'I'll be damned to all eternity if I do not fetch something and run him through the body!' The deceased and the rest of the company continued in the room where the affray happened; and in about half an hour the prisoner returned, having put off a thin slight coat he had on when he quitted the room, and put on one of a coarse thick cloth. The door of the room being open into the street, the prisoner stood leaning against the door-post, his left hand in his bosom, and a cudgel in his right, looking in upon the company, but not speaking a word. The deceased seeing him in that posture, invited him into the company: but the prisoner answered, 'I will not come in.' 'Why will you not?' said the deceased. The prisoner replied, 'Perhaps you will fall on me and beat me.' The deceased assured him he would not; and added, 'besides, you think yourself as good a man as me at cudgels, perhaps you will play at cudgels with me.' The prisoner answered, 'I am not afraid to do so, if you will keep off your fists.' Upon these words the deceased got up and went towards the prisoner, who dropped the cudgel as the deceased was coming up to him. The deceased took up the cudgel, and with it gave the prisoner two blows on the shoulder. The prisoner immediately put his right hand into his bosom, and drew out the blade of a tuck sword, crying, 'Damn you, stand off, or I'll stab you;' and immediately, without giving the deceased time to step back, made a pass at him with the sword, but missed him. The deceased thereupon gave back a little; and the prisoner shortening the sword in his hand, leaped forward towards the deceased and stabbed him to the heart, and he instantly died. The Judges unanimously agreed, that there were in this case so many circumstances of deliberate malice and deep revenge on the defendant's part, that his offence could not be less than wilful murder. He vowed he would fetch something to stick him, to run him through the body. Whom did he mean by him? Every circumstance in the case showed that he meant his brother. He returned to the company, provided, to appearance, with an ordinary cudgel, as if he intended to try skill and manhood a second time with that weapon: but the deadly weapon was all the while carefully concealed under his coat; which most probably he had changed for the purpose of concealing the weapon. He stood at the door, refusing to come nearer, but artfully drew on the discourse of the past quarrel; and as soon as he saw his brother disposed to engage a second time at cudgels, he dropped his cudgel and betook him to the deadly weapon, which till that moment he had concealed. He did indeed bid his brother stand off: but he gave him no opportunity of doing so before the first pass was made. His brother retreated before the second: but he advanced as fast, and took the revenge he had vowed. The circumstance of the blows before the sword was produced, which probably occasioned the doubt, did not alter the case, nor did the precedent quarrel; because, all circumstances considered, he appeared to have returned with a deliberate resolution to take a deadly revenge for what had passed: and the blows were plainly a provocation sought on his part, that he might execute the wicked purpose of his heart with some colour of excuse. (o)

In the foregoing case it was considered that the blows with the cudgel were a provocation sought by the prisoner, to give occasion and pretence for the dreadful vengeance which he meditated: and it should be observed, that where the provocation is sought by the party killing, and induced by his own act, in order to afford him a pretence for wreaking his malice, it will in no case be of any avail. (p) Thus where A. and B. having fallen out, A. said he would not strike, but would give B. a pot of ale to strike him; upon which B. did strike, and A. killed him, it was held to be murder. (q) So where A. and B. were at some difference; A. bade B. take a pin out of his (A.'s) sleeve, intending to take the occasion to strike or wound B.: B. accordingly took out the pin, and A. struck him and killed him; and this was ruled murder: first, because it was no provocation when B. did it by the consent of A.; and, secondly, because it appeared to be a malicious and deliberate artifice, by which to take occasion to kill B. Thomas' case. There must be both provocation, and the fatal blow must be the result of such provocation, to reduce the crime to manslaughter.

Where upon an indictment for maliciously wounding under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it appeared that some words passed between the prisoner and a third person, after which he walked up and down the passage of the house with a sword-stick in his hand, with the blade open, and was heard to say, 'If any man strikes me I will make him repent it.' He was desired to put up the stick, which he refused to do; and shortly after the prosecutor, ignorant of what had occurred, but perceiving the prisoner was creating a disturbance, struck the prisoner twice with his fist, when the prisoner stabbed him; Mr. B. Parke told the jury, 'If a person receives a blow, and immediately avenges it with any instrument that he may happen to have in his hand, then the offence will be only manslaughter, provided the blow is to be attributed to the passion of anger arising from that previous provocation; for anger is a passion to which good and bad men are both subject. But the law requires two things: first, that there should be that provocation; and secondly, that the fatal blow should be clearly traced to the influence of passion arising from that provocation. (s) There is no doubt here, but that a violent assault was committed; but the question is, whether the blow given by the prisoner was produced by the passion of anger excited by that assault? If you see that a person denotes, by the manner in which he avenges a previous blow, that he is not excited by a sudden transport of passion, but under the influence of that wicked disposition, that bad spirit, which the law terms "malice," in the definition of wilful murder, then the offence would not be manslaughter. Suppose, for instance, a blow were given, and the party struck beat the other's head to pieces by continued, cruel, and repeated blows; then you could not attribute that act to the passion of anger, and the offence would be murder. And so, if you find that before the stroke is given, there is a determination to punish any man, who gives a blow, with such an instrument as the one which the prisoner used; because if you are satisfied that before the blow was given the prisoner meant to give a wound with such an instrument, it is impossible to attribute the giving such wound to the passion of anger excited by that blow; for no man who was under proper feelings, none but a bad man of a wicked and cruel disposition, would really determine beforehand to resent a blow with such an instrument.' On a trial for murder, it appeared that the prisoner and his son were wrestling on a floor together, the son being uppermost, the son got up, and went to the door, and the prisoner took up a coal pick, and threw it at the deceased and hit him on the back. The deceased said it hurt him, and the prisoner said he would have his revenge. The deceased stood at the door with his hands against it, when the prisoner took a knife off the table and jobbed the deceased with it on the left side. The deceased said, 'Father, you have killed me!' and retreated a few paces into the street, reeling as he went. A person told the prisoner he had stabbed his son. He said, 'Joe, I will have my revenge!' The deceased came into the house again, and the prisoner stabbed him again in the left side. There was also evidence of expressions of ill will by the prisoner towards the deceased, and of threats uttered a short time before. Coleridge, J. told the jury that 'in some instances you must feel certain, from the acts of the party, that he had a grudge. Suppose a man destroyed another by poison; if it were proved that he had previously bought the poison and prepared the cup, although he should have had a quarrel with the party at the very time of administering it, you could not doubt that there was express malice. If a person has received a blow, and in the consequent irritation immediately inflicts a wound that occasions death, that will be manslaughter. But he shall not be allowed to make this blow a cloak for what he does; and therefore, as in the case of poisoning, though there have been an actual quarrel, and the deceased shall have given a great number of blows, yet if the party inflict the wound, not in consequence of those blows, but in consequence of previous malice, all the blows would go for nothing. So, in the present case, if there was a stab given in consequence of a grudge entertained a day or two before, all that passed between these parties at the very time must go for nothing, for the simple reason, that the blows were not the cause of the crime.' After observing on the danger of relying on the previous threats, the very learned Judge proceeded, 'Then I will suppose that all was unpremeditated till C. came, and then the case will stand thus, the father and son have a quarrel, the son gets the father down, the son has the best of it, and the father has received considerable provocation; and if when he got up and threw the pick at the deceased, he had at once killed him, I should have said at once that it was manslaughter. Now comes the more important question, (the son having given no further provocation) whether in truth that, which was in the first instance sufficient provocation, was so recent to the actual deadly blow, that it excused the act that was done, and whether the father was acting under the recent sting or had time to cool, and then took up the deadly weapon. I told you just now he must be excused if the provocation was recent, and he acting on its sting, and the blood remained hot: but you must consider all the circumstances, the time which elapses, the prisoner's previous conduct, the deadly nature of the weapon, the repetition of the blows; because, though the law condescends to human frailty, it will not indulge human ferocity. It considers man to be a rational being, and requires that he should exercise a reasonable control over his passions.' (u)

stream Guards, went to a public-house in company with his brother and another person; there were two more soldiers in the house, and the deceased was sitting with them: a dispute arose about paying the reckoning, and a fight took place between the prisoner and one Burrows: in the scuffle B. fell down by the fireplace on his knees, and the deceased jumped over the table and struck the prisoner: the deceased was turned out by the landlord, but admitted again in about ten minutes, and the parties all remained drinking together after that for a quarter of an hour, when the prisoner and his brother went out; the deceased remained about a quarter of an hour after the prisoner, and then left; the prisoner and the deceased were both in liquor; the deceased tried to get out directly after the prisoner left, but was detained by the persons in the room: as soon as they let him go, he jumped over the table, and went out of the house, saying as he went, that if he caught them he would serve them out: the deceased was a person who boasted of his powers as a fighter: the deceased followed the prisoner and his brother into a mews not far from the public-house where they had been drinking; and a witness, who lived near, stated that he heard a noise, and went to the door of his house, and then heard a bayonet fall on the ground, and on going out heard one Croft crying out 'Police, police; a man is stabbed!' and on going up found the deceased lying on the ground wounded. Croft stated that he was near and heard voices, which induced him to run towards a bar, and when within a yard of the bar he heard a blow like the blow of a fist, this was followed by other blows; after the blows he heard a voice say 'take that!' and in half a minute the same voice said, 'he has stabbed me!' the deceased then ran towards him, and said, 'I am stabbed!' and soon fell on the ground: the prisoner was soon afterwards taken into custody, and was then bleeding at the nose; the prisoner had not any side-arms; but his brother had a bayonet: for the defence the brother stated that when they got about twenty yards through the bar mentioned by Croft, he heard somebody say something, and deceased came up and struck him on the back of the head, which caused him to fall down, and his bayonet fell out of the sheath upon the stones, and the deceased picked it up, and followed the prisoner who had gone on; there was a great struggle between them, and very shortly after the deceased cried out 'I am stabbed!' A surgeon proved that there were wounds on the prisoner's hands, such as would be made by stabs of a bayonet, and that his back was one uniform bruise. Bosanquet, J., told the jury, 'the question for you, on a careful consideration of the whole evidence, will be, whether the prisoner was guilty of either murder or manslaughter, or whether the circumstances of the case were such as to entitle him to an acquittal: whether he is guilty of murder or manslaughter, or whether his act was justifiable or excusable: upon the question of whether it amounts to murder you have to consider this; did the prisoner enter into a contest with an unarmed man, intending to avail himself of a deadly weapon? For if he did, it will amount to murder. But if he did not enter into the contest with an intention of using it, then the question will be, did he use it in the heat of passion in consequence of an attack made upon him? If he did, then it will be manslaughter. But there is another question, did he use the weapon in defence of his life? Before a person can avail himself of that defence, he must satisfy the jury that that defence was necessary; that he did all he could to avoid it; and that it was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself from such serious bodily harm as would give a reasonable apprehension that his life was in immediate danger. If he used the weapon, having no other means of resistance, and no means of escape, in such case, if he retreated as far as he could, he will be justified.' (v)

Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner, a very powerful man, had met the deceased, an old umbrella-seller, whom he did not appear to have known, at a public-house, and he took hold of one of his umbrellas and asked what it would be, and the deceased said a shilling; the prisoner offered fourpence, and thereupon idle talk took place, from which it appeared that the deceased was annoyed at the trifling value set on the umbrella, and the prisoner at some of the remarks of the deceased. The deceased was going away, when he tripped, and, though the witnesses did not see the prisoner put out his foot to trip him up, it appeared that he had done so, for the deceased angrily said that if he did that again he would knock him down, or something to that effect. The deceased then was again going away, when he again tripped, and, as would appear, from the same cause. Thereupon the deceased turned and struck the prisoner as hard as he could on the head with an old umbrella, the handle of which (not very strong) was broken with the blows. The prisoner said nothing while the blows were being given, nor was he seen to draw anything, nor was it seen whether he had a knife in his hand before; if not, he must then, or immediately afterwards, have drawn it out of his pocket and unclasped it; for immediately after he was seen to strike out at the deceased, and the latter staggered away, and was found to have received a wound in the stomach, inflicted with such force that the weapon went right through to the spine, severing an artery, and so causing death in a short time. The prisoner was found to have an open clasp-knife in his hand, and a minute after he said, 'I have given him this,' showing it. Erle, C. J., told the jury that the essence of the crime of murder is the malice, and the law implies malice where one has killed another by the use of a deadly weapon, unless the circumstances rebut the inference, and reduce the offence to manslaughter. The circumstances of the case do rebut the inference of malice, if they show that the blow was given in the heat of passion arising on a sudden provocation, and before the passion had time to cool. This you are to judge of. In the present case the quarrel was sudden; the knife was a clasp-knife, such as might naturally be carried about the person, and was not fetched for the purpose; and the deceased struck the first blow, and struck repeated blows; these blows were not severe enough to excuse the use of a deadly weapon (especially as the prisoner was so much the more powerful man, and had not used his natural weapons); but if they excited a passion, in the heat of which the prisoner gave the fatal blow, then you may find him guilty of manslaughter, a crime which greatly varies in intensity, and may come very nearly up to murder.' (w)

Noon's case.

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner and his wife, who had been to look for him, came home about midnight: he was not sober, and she upbraided him for staying out so late: he took some money out, and she said he could treat other persons and not her; he then took down a sword from a shelf, pulled it out of the sheath, and struck her on the back with the flat part of it; her daughter ran to the door; the mother attempted to follow her, and her daughter took hold of her hand to pull her through; the father, according to the daughter's first account, went to his wife at the door, and ran the sword into her left side; but it appeared that she could not see the actual thrust: a wound nine inches long was found in the left side which caused the death. She stated in her husband's presence that he had done it with a sword. The authorities cited ante, p. 667, having been referred to; Cresswell, J., after referring to them, said, 'This is expressed more intelligibly by the late Mr. J. Littledale, who says that "malice, in its legal sense, denotes a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse." (x) Therefore if you think the prisoner used the weapon wilfully, then that is such malice as the law requires. The great question for your consideration is whether the wound was given wilfully. If done by the accident of the woman rushing on the sword, the prisoner would not be responsible. If you can find any evidence that he used the sword carelessly, and that, without intending to inflict a wound, he caused it, then he is guilty of manslaughter; but if he used it intending to inflict a wound, then he is guilty of murder. When there is a contest the law makes great allowances for blows and a personal encounter, but not for words. If, therefore, in consequence of words, the prisoner was provoked, and intended to do the deceased a grievous injury, that is no justification or alleviation of the offence. There is no evidence of any conflict or of any provocation in law. If the prisoner used the sword intending to do a serious injury, that is such evidence of malice as the law holds to be murder. If the deceased rushed upon it, then it was an accident, and he is not guilty. If the wound was inflicted in a struggle without any intention on the part of the prisoner to use it, then there was such a careless use of it as to make him guilty of manslaughter.' (xx)

Provocation will not avail, if there is time for cooling.

It must be further observed also, that in every case of homicide upon provocation, how great soever that provocation may have been, if there be sufficient time for passion to subside and reason to interpose, such homicide will be murder. (y) Therefore, in the case of the most grievous provocation to which a man can be exposed, that of finding another in the act of adultery with his wife, though it would be but manslaughter if he should kill the adulterer in the first transport of passion, yet if he kill him deliberately, and upon revenge after the fact and sufficient cooling time, it would undoubtedly be murder. (z) 'For let it be observed, that in all possible cases, deliberate homicide upon a principle of revenge is murder. No man under the protection of the law is to be the avenger of his own wrongs. If they are of a nature, for which the laws of society will give him an adequate remedy, thither he ought to resort: but be they of what nature soever, he ought to bear his lot with patience, and remember that vengeance belongeth only to the Most High.' (a) With respect to the interval of time which shall be allowed for passion to subside, it has been observed that it is much more easy to lay down rules for determining what cases are without the limits, than how far exactly those limits extend. (b) In cases of this kind the immediate object of inquiry is, whether the suspension of reason arising from sudden passion continued from the time of the provocation received to the very instant of the mortal stroke given; for if from any circumstance whatever it appear that the party reflected, deliberated, or cooled any time before the fatal stroke given; or if in legal presumption there was time or opportunity for cooling; the killing will amount to murder, as being attributable to malice and revenge, rather than to human frailty. (c) Whether the blood has had time to cool or not is a question for the Court and not for the jury, but it is for the jury to find what length of time elapsed between the provocation received and the act done. (d)

If it appear that the party deliberated, or had time to do so, it is murder.

Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased, who had been upon terms of intimacy for three or four years, had been drinking together at a public-house till about twelve o'clock at night; about one they were together in the street, and had some words, and a scuffle ensued, during which the deceased struck the prisoner in the face with his fist, and gave him a black eye. The prisoner called for the police, and on a policeman coming, went away; he, however, returned again, between five and ten minutes afterwards, and stabbed the deceased with a knife on the left side of the abdomen: the knife, a common bread-and-cheese knife, was one that the prisoner was in the habit of carrying about with him, and he was rather weak in his intellect, but not so much so as not to know right from wrong. Lord Tenterden, C. J., 'It is not every slight provocation, even by a blow, which will, when the party receiving it strikes with a deadly weapon, reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter; but it depends upon the time elapsing between the blow and the injury; and also whether the injury was inflicted with an instrument at the moment in the possession of the party, or whether he went to fetch it from another place. It is uncertain, in this case, how long the prisoner was absent; the witness says from five to ten minutes, according to the best of his knowledge. Unless attention is particularly called to it, it seems to me that evidence of time is very uncertain; the prisoner may have been absent less than five minutes; there is no evidence that he went anywhere for the knife. The father says it was a knife he carried about with him; it was a common knife, such as a man in the prisoner's situation in life might have; for aught that appears he might have gone a little way from the deceased and then returned, still smarting under the blow he had received. You will also take into consideration the previous habits and connection of the deceased and the prisoner with respect to each other; if there had been any old grudge between them, then the crime which the prisoner committed might be murder. But it seems they had been long in habits of intimacy, and on the very night in question, about an hour before the blow, they had been drinking in a friendly way together. If you think that there was not time and interval sufficient for the passion of a man, proved to be of no very strong intellect, to cool, and for reason to regain her dominion over his mind, then you will say that the prisoner is guilty only of manslaughter. But if you think that the act was the act of a wicked, malicious, and diabolical mind (which, under the circumstances, I should think you hardly would), then you will find him guilty of murder.' (e)

If thought and contrivance be shown in procuring a weapon after provocation given, that shows that the prisoner was under the influence of reason.

If thought, contrivance, and design be shown by a prisoner in the mode of procuring a deadly weapon after provocation has been given, and in again replacing the weapon immediately after the blow with it has been struck, this tends to show that the prisoner was acting under the influence of judgment and reason, rather than of violent and ungovernable passion. The deceased was requested by his mother to turn the prisoner out of her house, which after a short struggle with the prisoner he effected, and in doing so he gave him one kick. The prisoner said he would make him remember it, and instantly went to his own lodgings, from two to three hundred yards distant, passed through his bed-room and a kitchen into a pantry, and returned thence hastily back again. Within five minutes after the prisoner had left the deceased, the latter followed him to give him back his hat, which had been left behind, and they met about ten yards from the prisoner's lodgings. They stopped for a short time, when they were heard talking together, but without any words of anger; after they had walked on together for about fifteen yards, the deceased gave the prisoner his hat, when the latter exclaimed with an oath, that he would have his rights, and instantly stabbed the deceased with a knife or some sharp instrument, in two places, giving him a mortal wound in the belly. As soon as he had stabbed him the second time, he said he had served him right, and instantly ran back to his lodgings, passed hastily through his bed-room and the kitchen to the pantry, and thence back to his bed-room, where he undressed himself and went to bed. Shortly afterwards he was apprehended, and no knife or other instrument found upon him. In the pantry the prisoner had a sharp butcher's knife, with which he usually ate, and which was kept on a shelf with his meat; and in another part of the pantry three other knives of a similar description, which he used in his business of a butcher. The several knives were found the next morning in their usual places in the pantry. Tindal, C. J., told the jury that the question for them was, whether the wound was given by the prisoner while smarting under a provocation so recent and so strong that the prisoner might not be considered at the moment the master of his own understanding: or whether there had been time for the blood to cool, and for reason to resume its seat, before the wound was given. That in determining this question, the most favourable circumstance for the prisoner was the shortness of time between the original quarrel and the stabbing; but, on the other hand, the weapon was not at hand when the quarrel took place, but was sought for from a distant place. It would be for them to say whether the prisoner had shown thought, contrivance, and design in the mode of possessing himself of the weapon, and again replacing it immediately after the blow was struck; for the exercise of contrivance and design denoted rather the presence of judgment and reason than of violent and ungovernable passion. (f)

From the cases which have been stated in the former part of this section, it appears that malice will be presumed, even though the act be perpetrated recently after the provocation received, if the instrument or manner of retaliation be greatly inadequate to the offence given, and cruel and dangerous in its nature; for the law supposes that a party capable of acting in so outrageous a manner upon a slight provocation must have entertained a general, if not a particular malice, and have previously determined to inflict such vengeance upon any pretence that offered. (g)

SEC. II.

Cases of Mutual Combat.

WHERE words of reproach or other sudden provocations have led to blows and mutual combat, and death has ensued, the important inquiry will be, whether the occasion was altogether sudden, and not the result of pre-conceived anger or malice; for in no case will the killing, though in mutual combat, admit of alleviation, if the fighting were upon malice. (h)

Thus a party killing another in a deliberate duel is guilty of murder; for wherever two persons in cold blood meet and fight on a precedent quarrel, and one of them is killed, the other is guilty of murder, (i) and cannot help himself by alleging that he was first struck by the deceased; or that he had often declined to meet him, and was prevailed upon to do it by his importunity; or that it was his intent only to vindicate his reputation; (k) or that he meant not to kill, but only to disarm his adversary. (l) He has deliberately engaged in an act, highly unlawful, in defiance of the laws, and he must at his peril abide the consequences; and upon this principle, wherever two persons quarrel over night and appoint to fight the next day, or quarrel in the morning and agree to fight in the afternoon, or at any time afterwards so considerable that in common intendment it must be presumed that the blood was cooled, the person killing will be guilty of murder. (m) And in a case where, upon a quarrel happening at a tavern, Lord Morley objected to fighting at that time, on account of the disadvantage he should have by reason of the height of his shoes, and presently afterwards went into a field and fought; the circumstance was relied on as showing that he did not fight in the first passion. (n) So wherever there is an act of deliberation, and a meeting by compact, such mutual combat will not excuse the party killing from the guilt of murder; as where B. challenged A., and A. refused to meet him, but in order to evade the law, told B. that he should go the next day to a certain town about his business, and accordingly B. met him the next day in the road to the same town and assaulted him, whereupon they fought, and A. killed B., it is said that A. seems guilty of murder; but the same conclusion would not follow, if it should appear by the whole circumstances that he gave B. such information accidentally, and not with a design to give him an opportunity of fighting. (o) Upon the same principle, if A. and B. meet deliberately to fight, and A. strike B., and pursue B. so closely that B., in safeguard of his own life, kills A., this is murder in B.; because their meeting was a compact, and an act of deliberation, in pursuance of which all that follows is presumed to be done. (p)

Where there is an act of deliberation and a meeting by compact, it is murder.

And the law so far abhors all duelling in cold blood, that not only the principal who actually kills the other, but also his second, is guilty of murder; (q) and it has been held that the second also of the person killed is equally guilty by reason of the countenance given to the principal, and of the compact; but this was considered as a severe construction by Lord Hale, who thought that

But a quæ is added in 1 Hale, 452, whether, if B. had really and truly declined the fight, ran away as far as he could, and offered to yield, and yet A., refusing to decline it, had attempted his death, and B. after this had killed A. in his own defence, it would excuse him from the guilt of murder; admitting clearly that if the running away were only a pretence to save his own life, but was really designed to draw out A. to kill him, it would be murder. This quære of Lord Hale's is discussed in 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 54, p. 284, et seq., and it is observed that Mr. J. Blackstone (4 Blac. (Lord Raym. 1489.) Mr. East, after reasoning in favour of the extenuation of the crime of the duellist so declining to fight, proceeds thus: 'Yet still it may be doubtful whether, admitting the full force of this reasoning, the offence can be less than manslaughter, or whether in such case the party can altogether excuse himself upon the foot of necessity in self-defence, because the necessity which was induced from his own faulty and illegal act, namely, the agreement to fight, was in the first instance deliberately foreseen and resolved upon, in defiance of the law.' 1 East, P. the law in that case was too far strained. (r) It is now, however, settled that the seconds of both are guilty of murder. (s) Where therefore an indictment charged Monro with the murder of Fawcett and the prisoner as present, aiding and assisting in the murder, and the death was shown to have occurred in a duel, in which Monro was one of the principals and the prisoner was said to have acted as second to the deceased; the jury were told, as a matter about which no judge entertained any doubt, that where two persons go out to fight a deliberate duel, and death ensues, all persons who are present on the occasion, encouraging or promoting the death, will be guilty of abetting the principal offender, and that, without giving them any particular name, all persons who are present aiding, assisting, and abetting that deliberate duel are within the terms of such an indictment as this. (t)

With regard to other persons who are present at a premeditated duel, the question is, did they give their aid and assistance by their countenance and encouragement of the principals in the contest? Mere presence is not sufficient; but if they sustain the principals by their advice or presence, or if they go for the purpose of encouraging and forwarding the unlawful conflict, although they do not say or do anything, yet if they are present and assisting and encouraging at the moment when the pistol is fired, they are guilty of murder. (u)

Where the combat is not an act of deliberation, but the immediate consequence of sudden quarrel, it does not of course fall within the foregoing doctrine; yet in cases of this kind the law may come to the conclusion of malice, if the party killing began the attack with circumstances of undue advantage. (v) For in order to save the party making the first assault, upon an insufficient local provocation, from the guilt of murder, the occasion must not only be sudden, but the party assaulted must be put on an equal footing in point of defence; at least at the onset: and this more particularly where the attack is made with deadly or dangerous weapons. (w)

Undue advantage.

Thus if B. draw his sword and make a pass at A., the sword of A. being then undrawn, and thereupon A. draw his sword, and a combat ensue, in which A. is killed, this will be murder; for B., by making the pass, while his adversary's sword was undrawn, shows that he sought his blood; and A.'s endeavour to defend himself, which he had a right to do, will not excuse B. In Mawgridge's case, words of anger happening, Mawgridge threw a bottle with great force at the head of Mr. Cope, and immediately drew his sword. Violent conduct of the party killing.

Oneby's case.

Even if the parties are upon an equal footing when the combat begins, malice may be implied from the violent conduct which the party killing pursued in the first instance; more especially where there is time for cooling, and such expressions are used as manifest deliberation; as in the following case of Major Oneby:—

Major Oneby was indicted for the murder of Mr. Gower; and a special verdict was found, containing the following statement. The prisoner being in company with the deceased and three other persons at a tavern, in a friendly manner, after some time, began playing at hazard; when Rich, one of the company, asked if any one would set him three half crowns; whereupon the deceased, in a jocular manner, laid down three halfpence, telling Rich he had set him three pieces; and the prisoner at the same time set Rich three half crowns, and lost them to him. Immediately after which, in an angry manner, he turned about to the deceased, and said, it was an impertinent thing to set halfpence, and that he was an impertinent puppy for so doing, to which the deceased answered, whoever called him so was a rascal. Thereupon the prisoner took up a bottle, and with great force threw it at the deceased's head; but did not hit him, the bottle only brushing some of the powder out of his hair. The deceased in return immediately tossed a candlestick or bottle at the prisoner, which missed him; upon which they both rose up to fetch their swords, which then hung up in the room, and the deceased drew his sword; but the prisoner was prevented from drawing his by the company. The deceased thereupon threw away his sword; and the company interposing, they sat down again for the space of an hour. At the expiration of that time the deceased said to the prisoner, 'We have had hot words, but you were the aggressor; but I think we may pass it over;' and at the same time offered his hand to the prisoner, who made answer, 'No, damn you; I will have your blood.' After which, the reckoning being paid, all the company, except the prisoner, went out of the room to go home; and he called to the deceased, saying, 'Young man! come back; I have something to say to you;' whereupon the deceased returned into the room, and the door was closed, and the rest of the company excluded; but they heard a clashing of swords, and the prisoner gave the deceased the mortal wound. It was also found, that at the breaking up of the company the prisoner had his great coat thrown over his shoulders, and that he received three slight wounds in the fight; and that the deceased, being asked upon his death-bed, whether he received his wound in a manner among sword-men called fair, answered, 'I think I did.' It was further found that, from the throwing of the bottle, there was no reconciliation between the prisoner and the deceased. Upon these facts all the Judges were of opinion that the prisoner was guilty of murder; he having acted upon malice and deliberation, and not from sudden passion. It should probably be taken, upon the facts found in the verdict and the argument of the Chief Justice, that, after the door had been shut, the parties were upon an equal footing in point of preparation before the fight began in which the mortal wound was given. The main point then on which the judgment turned, and so declared to be, was the evidence of express malice, after the interposition of the company, and the parties had all sat down again for an hour. Under those circumstances the Court were of opinion that the prisoner had had reasonable time for cooling; after which, upon an offer of reconciliation from the deceased, he had made use of that bitter and deliberate expression, that he would have his blood. And again, the prisoner remaining in the room after the rest of the company retired, and calling back the deceased by the contemptuous appellation of young man, on pretence of having something to say to him, altogether showed such strong proof of deliberation and coolness as precluded the presumption of passion having continued down to the time of the mortal stroke. Though even that would not have availed the prisoner under these circumstances; for it must have been implied, according to Mauwgridge's case, that he acted upon malice; having in the first instance, before any provocation received, and without warning or giving time for preparation on the part of Mr. Gower, made a deadly assault upon him. (z)

If, after an interchange of blows on equal terms, one of the parties, on a sudden, and without any such intention at the commencement of the affray, snatches up a deadly weapon and kills the other party with it, such killing will be only manslaughter. But if a party, under colour of fighting upon equal terms, uses from the beginning of the contest a deadly weapon without the knowledge of the other party, and kills the other party with such weapon; or if, at the beginning of the contest, he prepares a deadly weapon, so as to have the power of using it in some part of the contest, and uses it accordingly in the course of the combat, and kills the other party with the weapon; the killing in both these cases will be murder. The prisoner and Levy quarrelled and went out to fight. After two rounds, which occupied little more than two minutes, Levy was found to be stabbed in a great many places; and of one of those stabs he almost instantly died. It appeared that nobody could have stabbed him but the prisoner; who had a clasped knife before the affray. Bayley, J., told the jury, that if the prisoner used the knife privately from the beginning; or if before they began to fight he placed the knife so that he might use it during the affray, and used it accordingly, it was murder; but that if he took to the knife after the fight began, and without having placed it to be ready during the affray, it was only manslaughter. The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder. (a) between them, but no instrument was seen either before or at the time in the prisoner's hands; Bayley, J., 'When persons fight on fair terms, and merely with fists, where life is not likely to be at hazard, and the blows passing between them are not likely to cause death, if death ensues, it is manslaughter; and if persons meet originally on fair terms, and after an interval, blows having been given, a party draws in the heat of blood a deadly instrument, and inflicts a deadly injury, it is manslaughter only. But if a party enters into a contest dangerously armed, and fights under an unfair advantage, though mutual blows pass, it is not manslaughter, but murder. If you are of opinion that the prisoner entered into the contest, being unduly armed with an instrument calculated to produce the effects charged in the indictment, and with the instrument ready in his hand, in order that he might resort to it with any of the alleged intents, then he is guilty. For if death had ensued it would have been murder.' (b)

It seems to have been considered in one case that the nature of a mutual combat might be such as to render the case one of murder. Upon an indictment for manslaughter the evidence was that the prisoner and deceased were 'fighting up and down,' and that the deceased died of the injury he sustained in the fight. Bayley, J., to the jury, 'Fighting up and down is calculated to produce death, and the foot is an instrument likely to produce death. If death happens in a fight of that description it is murder, and not manslaughter.' The prisoner having been convicted, Bayley, J., told him that if he had been charged with murder, the evidence adduced would have sustained the indictment. (c)

counterfeit reconciliation.

Though, where there has been an old quarrel between A. and B., and a reconciliation between them, and afterwards, upon a new and sudden falling out, A. kills B., this is not murder; yet if upon the circumstances it appears that the reconciliation was but pretended or counterfeit, and that the hurt done was upon the score of the old malice, it is murder. Cases of Resistance to Officers of Justice, to Persons acting in their aid, and to private Persons lawfully interfering to apprehend Felons, or prevent a Breach of the Peace.

Resisting and killing officers.

MINISTERS of justice, as bailiffs, constables, watchmen, &c., (e) while in the execution of their offices, are under the peculiar protection of the law; a protection founded in wisdom and equity,

(c) Thorpe's case, 1 Lew. 171. 'Fighting up and down' is described in Roscoe's Cr. E. 685, as 'a brutal and savage practice in the north of England.' It is to be remarked, that the observations of the very learned judge were quite unnecessary, as the indictment was only for manslaughter, and their correctness may well be questioned, as they are opposed to all those cases where deadly weapons have been used in mutual combat upon a sudden quarrel. See the cases, post, tit. Manslaughter, Mutual Combat. C. S. G.

and in every principle of political justice: for without it the public tranquillity cannot possibly be maintained, or private property secured; nor in the ordinary course of things will offenders of any kind be amenable to justice. For these reasons the killing of officers so employed has been deemed murder of malice prepense, as being an outrage wilfully committed in defiance of the justice of the kingdom. If, therefore, upon an affray, the constable, and others in his assistance, come to suppress the affray and preserve the peace, and in executing their office the constable or any of the assistants is killed, it is murder in law, although the murderer knew not the party that was killed, and although the affray was sudden, because the constable and his assistants came by authority of law to keep the peace, and prevent the danger which might ensue by the breach of it; and, therefore, the law will adjudge it murder, and that the murderer had malice prepense, because he set himself against the justice of the realm: so if the sheriff, or any of his bailiffs, or other officers, is killed in executing the process of the law, or in doing their duty, it is murder; the same is the law as to a watchman who is killed in the execution of his office. (f) This rule is not confined to the instant the officer is upon the spot, and at the scene of action, engaged in the business that brought him thither; for he is under the same protection of the law eundo, morando, et redeundo; and therefore if he come to do his office, and meeting with great opposition, retire, and be killed in the retreat, this will amount to murder; as he went in obedience to the law and in the execution of his office, and his retreat was necessary in order to avoid the danger by which he was threatened. And, upon the same principle, if he meet with opposition by the way, and be killed before he come to the place, such opposition being intended to prevent his doing his duty, (which is a fact to be collected from circumstances appearing in evidence,) this likewise will amount to murder. (g)

A policeman is entitled to the same protection in the execution of his duty as a constable, and if he is killed in the execution of his duty it will be murder. Where, therefore, a policeman between eleven and twelve o'clock at night was called upon to clear a beer-house, which he did, and then went into the street where the prisoner and many others were standing near the door, when the prisoner refused to go home, and used very abusive and violent language, and the policeman laid his hand on his shoulder gently, and told him to go away, on which the prisoner immediately stabbed him with a knife in the throat; it was held that if the policeman had died, this would have been murder; for if a policeman had heard any noise in the beer-house at such a time of night, he would have acted within the line of his duty, if he had gone in, and insisted that the house should be cleared; and much more so, if he was required by the landlady; and after that was done, if a knot of people remained in the street, and the crowd increased in consequence of their attention being drawn to the clearing of the house, and if anything was saying or doing likely to lead to a breach of the peace, the policeman was not only bound to interfere, but it would have been a breach of his duty if he had not done so, and if in so doing he ordered the people to go away, and anyone was unwilling, and defied the policeman, and used threatening language, the policeman was perfectly justified in insisting upon that person going off; and if he had warned him several times, and he would not go away, and used threatening language if anyone ventured to touch him, the policeman was entirely justified in using a degree of violence to push him from the place, in order to get him to go home; and therefore anything that he did would not be in the nature of an assault, but would be an act in the discharge of his duty, and therefore any blow that was given afterwards with a cutting instrument would be precisely the same as if it had been given without anything being done by the policeman. (h) So where a policeman saw the prisoner playing the bagpipes in a street at half-past eleven o'clock at night, by which he collected a large crowd around him, among whom were prostitutes and thieves, and the policeman told him he could not be allowed to play at that time of night, and he must go on, but he said he would be damned if he would, and the policeman took hold of him by the shoulder, and slightly pushed him, on which the prisoner wounded him with a razor; it was held, that if the prisoner was collecting a crowd of persons at that time of night, and the policeman desired him to go on, and laid his hand upon his shoulder with that view only, he did not exceed his duty, and if the prisoner then wounded him, it would have been murder if he had died; but if the policeman gave the prisoner a blow and knocked him down, he was not justified in so doing. (i)

in their aid.

The protection which the law affords to such ministers of justice is not, as we have seen, confined to their own persons. Everyone coming to their aid, and lending his assistance for the keeping of the peace, or attending for that purpose, whether commanded or not, is under the same protection as the officer himself. (h) Nor is the protection which the law affords in these cases confined to the ordinary ministers of justice, or their assistants. It extends, under certain limitations, to the cases of private persons interposing for preventing mischief from an affray, or using their endeavours to apprehend felons, or those who have given a dangerous wound, and to bring them to justice: such persons being likewise in the discharge of a duty required of them by the law. The law is their warrant, and they may not improperly be considered as persons engaged in the public service, and for the advancement of justice, though without any special appointment; and being so considered, they are under the same protection as the ordinary ministers of justice. (i) A person aiding a policeman in conveying a person suspected of felony to a station-house is entitled to the same protection cundo, morando, et redeundo as the policeman. The deceased having been required by a policeman to aid him in taking a man, whom he had apprehended on suspicion of stealing potatoes, to the station-house, did so for some time, and then was going away, when he was attacked and beaten to death; it was objected that he was not at the time aiding the policeman. Coltman, J., 'He is entitled to protection eundo, morando, et redeundo.' (m)

But with respect to private persons using their endeavours to bring felons to justice, it should be observed, by way of caution, that they must be careful to ascertain, in the first instance, that a felony has actually been committed, and that it has been committed by the person whom they would pursue and arrest. For if no felony has been committed, no suspicion, however well founded, will bring the person so interposing within this especial protection of the law: (n) nor will it be extended to those who, where a felony has actually been committed, upon suspicion, possibly well founded, pursue or arrest the wrong person. (o) But the law is otherwise in the case of an officer acting in pursuance of a warrant. For if A., being a peace-officer, has a warrant from a proper magistrate for the apprehending of B. by name, upon a charge of felony; or if B. stands indicted for felony; or if the hue and cry is levied against B. by name; in these cases if B., though innocent, fly, or turn and resist, and in the struggle or pursuit is killed by A., or any person joining in the hue and cry, the person so killing will be indemnified; and, on the other hand, if A., or any person joining in the hue and cry, is killed by B., or any of his accomplices joining in that outrage, such killing will be murder; for A. and those joining with him were in this instance in the discharge of a duty required from them by the law; and, in case of their wilful neglect of it, subject to punishment. (p)

A felony must have been committed, and by the person apprehended.

Upon these principles it may be laid down as a general rule, that where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, using the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, and killed, it will be murder in all who take a part in such resistance; for it is homicide committed in despite of the justice of the kingdom. This rule is laid down upon the supposition that resistance be made; and, upon that supposition, it is conceived that it will hold in all cases, whether civil or criminal; for under circumstances of resistance, in either case, the persons having authority to arrest or imprison may repel force by force, and will be justified if death should ensue in the struggle; while, on the other hand, the persons resisting will be guilty of murder. (q) And it has been decided, that if in any quarrel, sudden or premeditated, a justice of peace, constable, or watchman, or even a private person, be slain in endeavouring to keep the peace and suppress the affray, he who kills him will be guilty of murder. (r) But in such case the person slain must have given notice of the purpose for which he came, by commanding the parties in the King's name to keep the peace, or by otherwise showing that it was not his intention to take part in the quarrel, but to appease it; (s) unless, indeed, he were an officer within his proper district, and known, or generally acknowledged, to bear the office he had assumed. (t) As if A., B., and C. be in a tumult together, and D., the constable, come to appease the affray, and A., knowing him to be the constable, kill him, and B. and C., not knowing him to be the constable, come in, and finding A. and D. struggling, assist and abet A. in killing the constable, this is murder in A., but manslaughter in B. and C. (u) Where a constable interferes in an affray to keep the peace, and is killed, such of the persons concerned in killing him as knew him to be a constable are guilty of murder; and such as did not know it, of manslaughter only. (v)

Questions as to authority, legal proceedings, &c.

As to persons taking part in the resistance.

But it must be well remembered, that this protection of the law is extended only to persons who have authority to arrest or imprison, and who use such authority in a proper manner; and that questions of much nicety and difficulty will often arise upon the points of authority, legality of process, notice, and regularity of proceeding. The consideration of these points will be attempted in a subsequent part of the work: for as the consequences of defects in any of these particulars will generally be to extenuate the crime of killing, and reduce it to manslaughter, the discussion of them will perhaps be better introduced in the chapter relating to that species of homicide. (w)

With respect to the persons who shall be considered as taking a part in the resistance, it may be observed, that if the party who is arrested yield himself and make no resistance, but others endeavour to rescue him, and he do no act to declare his joining with them, if those who come to rescue him kill any of the bailiffs, this is murder in them, but not in the party arrested: but not so if he do any act to countenance the violence of the rescuers. (x) And where Jackson and four others, having committed a robbery, were pursued by the country upon hue and cry, and Jackson turned upon his pursuers (others of the robbers being in the same field, and having often resisted the pursuers), and refusing to yield, killed one of the pursuers: it was held, that inasmuch as all the robbers were of a company and made a common resistance, and so one animated the other, all those of the company of the robbers that were in the same field, though at a distance from Jackson, were principals, viz., present, aiding and abetting: and it was also held, that one of the malefactors who was apprehended a little before the party was hurt, being in custody when the stroke was given, was not guilty, unless it could be proved that after he was apprehended he had animated Jackson to kill the party. (y)

If a man be arrested, and he and his company endeavour a rescue, and, while they are fighting, one who knows nothing of the arrest coming by act in aid of the party arrested, and one of the bailiffs be killed, the person so acting in aid is guilty of murder; for a man must take the consequences of joining in any unlawful act, such as fighting; and his ignorance will not excuse him where the fact is made murder by the law without any actual precedent malice, as in the case of killing an officer in the due execution of his office. (z) But it should be observed, that, in another report of the same case, it is said to have been resolved, that if a person, not knowing the cause of the struggle, had interposed between the bailiff and the party arrested, with intent to prevent mischief, it would not have been murder in such person, though the bailiff's assistant were killed by one of the rescuers; (a) and it should seem that, in a case of this kind, the material inquiry would be, whether the stranger interfered with the intention of preserving the peace and preventing mischief; for if he interposed for the express purpose of aiding one party against the other, he must abide the consequences at his peril. (b)

A. beat B., a constable, who was in the execution of his office, and they were parted; and then C., a friend of A., rushed suddenly in, took up the quarrel, fell upon the constable, and killed him in the struggle; but A. was not engaged in this after he was parted from B. And it was holden by two judges, that this was murder only in C.; and A. was acquitted, because it was a sudden quarrel, and it did not appear that A. and C. came upon any design to abuse the constable. (c) But if a man begin a riot, and the same riot continue, and an officer be killed, he that began the riot would, if he remained present at it, be a principal murderer, though he did not commit the fact. (d)

A great number of persons assembled in a house called Sissinghurst, in Kent, issued out and committed a great riot and battery upon the possessors of a wood adjacent. One of their names, viz., A., was known, the rest were not known; and a warrant was obtained from a justice of peace to apprehend the said A., and divers other persons unknown, who were all together in Sissinghurst House. The constable, with about sixteen or twenty called to his assistance, came with the warrant to the house, and demanded entrance, and acquainted some of the persons within that he was the constable, and came with the justice's warrant, and demanded A. with the rest of the offenders that were then in the house; and one of the persons within came, and read the warrant, but denied admission to the constable, or to deliver A. or any of the malefactors; but, going in, commanded the rest of the company to stand to their staves. The constable and his assistants, fearing mischief, went away; and being about five rods from the door, B., C., D., E., F., &c., about fourteen in number, issued out and pursued the constable and his assistants. The constable commanded the peace, yet they fell on, and killed one of the assistants of the constable, and wounded others, and then retired into the house to the rest of their company which were in the house, whereof the said A. and one G. that read the warrant were two. For this A., B., C., D., E., F., G., and divers others, were indicted of murder, and tried at the King's Bench bar, when these points were unanimously determined:—

gave the stroke, or that it did not appear upon the evidence which of them gave the stroke, but only that it was given by one of the rioters, yet that such evidence was sufficient to maintain the indictment; for in law it was the stroke of all that party, according to the resolution in Mackally's case. (e)

2. That in this case all that were present and assisting to the rioters were guilty of the death of the party slain, though they did not all actually strike him, or any of the constable's company.

3. That those within the house, if they abetted or counselled the riot, were in law present aiding and assisting, and principals, as well as those that issued out and actually committed the assault; for it was but within five rods of the house, and in view thereof, and all done as it were in the same instant. 4. That here was sufficient notice that it was the constable, before the man was killed. 1. Because he was the constable of the same vill. 2. Because he notified his business at the door before the assault, viz., that he came with the justice's warrant. 3. Because, after his retreat, and before the man was slain, the constable commanded the peace; and, notwithstanding, the rioters fell on and killed the party.

5. It was resolved that the killing of the assistant of the constable was murder, as well as the killing of the constable himself.

6. That those who come in to the assistance of the constable, though not specially called thereunto, are under the same protection as they that are called to his assistance by name.

7. That although the constable retired with his company upon the not delivering up of A., yet the killing of the assistant of the constable in that retreat was murder. 1. Because the retreat was one continued act in pursuance of his office; being necessary, when he could not attain the object of his warrant, and being in effect a continuation of the execution of his office, and under the same protection of the law as his coming was. 2. Principally because the constable, in the beginning of the assault, and before the man was stricken, commanded the peace.

8. It seems that even if the constable had not commanded the peace, yet as he and his company came about what the law allowed them, and, when they could not effect it fairly, were going their way, the rioters pursuing them and killing one made the offence murder in them all; for the act was done without provocation, and the constable and his company were peaceably retiring; but this point was not relied upon, because there was enough upon the former point to convict the offenders. In the conclusion, the jury found nine of them guilty, and acquitted those within: not because they were absent, but because there was no clear evidence that they consented to the assault as the jury thought; and therefore judgment was given against the nine to be hanged. SEC. IV.

Cases where the Killing takes place in the Prosecution of some other Criminal, Unlawful, or Wanton Act.

If an action, unlawful in itself, be done deliberately, and with intention of mischief or great bodily harm to particular individuals, or of mischief indiscriminately, fall where it may, and death ensue against or beside the original intention of the party, it will be murder. (h)

Under this head may be mentioned the cases of particular malice to one individual falling by mistake or accident upon another, which, by the ignorance or lenity of juries, have been sometimes brought within the rule of accidental death. But though, in a loose way of speaking, it may be called accidental death when a person dies by a blow not intended against him, the case is considered by the law in a very different light. Thus, if it appears from circumstances that the injury intended to A., whether by poison, blow, or any other means of death, would have amounted to murder if he had been killed by it, it will amount to the same offence if B. happen to fall by the same means; (i) so that if C., having malice against A., strikes at and misses him, but kills B., this is murder in C.: (h) and upon the same principle, if A. and B. engage in a deliberate duel, and a stranger coming between them to part them is killed by one of them, it is murder in the party killing. (l) And it has also been resolved, that where A. had malice against D., the master of B., and assaulted him, and upon B. the servant coming to the aid of his master, A. killed B., it was murder in A. as much as if he had killed the master. (m) So, where A. gave a poisoned apple to his wife intending to poison her, and the wife, ignorant of the matter, gave it to a child who took it and died; this was held murder in A., though he, being present at the time endeavoured to dissuade his wife from giving the apple to the child. (n) And, upon the same principle, it was held to be murder where A. mixed poison in an electuary sent by an apothecary to her husband, which did not kill him, but afterwards killed the apothecary,

But Lord Hale thinks that this is mistaken, and that it is not murder in both, unless both struck him who came to part them; and says that by the book of 22 Ass. 71, Coron. 180 (which seems to be the case more at large) he only that gave the stroke had judgment, and was executed. 1 Hale, 441, to which this note is subjoined; 'the other does not appear to have been before the court: but, upon putting the case, the court said he that struck is guilty of felony, but said nothing as to him who did not strike.'

who to vindicate his reputation, tasted it himself, having first stirred it about. (o) Doubt was entertained, because the apothecary, of his own hand, without incitement from any one, not only partook of the electuary, but mingled it together, so as to incorporate the poison, and make its operation more forcible than the mixture as made by the wife of A.: but the Judges resolved that she was guilty of murder; for the putting the poison into the electuary was the cause of the death: and if a person prepares poison with intent to kill any reasonable creature, such person is guilty of the murder of whatever reasonable creature is killed thereby. (p) So if A. put poison into wine, with intent to kill B., and C. drinks thereof and dies, A. is guilty of the murder of C.: and it makes no difference that the wine, unless stirred up, would not have killed C., and that C., thinking there was sugar in it, stirred it up. Murder in attempting to procure an abortion.

So, where a person gave medicine to a woman to procure an abortion, (r) and where a person put skewers into the womb of a woman for the same purpose; (s) by which in both cases the women were killed, these acts were held clearly to be murder; for, though the death of the woman was not intended, the acts were of a nature deliberate and malicious, and necessarily attended with great danger to the persons on whom they were practised.

General malice or depraved inclination to mischief.

There are also other cases where no mischief is intended to any particular individual, but where there is a general malice or depraved inclination to mischief, fall where it may; and in these cases the Act itself being unlawful, attended with probable serious danger, and done with a mischievous intent to hurt people, the killing will amount to murder. (t) Thus, if a man go deliberately, and with an intent to do mischief, upon a horse used to strike, or coolly discharge a gun amongst a multitude of people, and death be the consequence of such acts, it will be murder. (u) So, if a man resolves to kill the next man he meets, and does kill him, it is murder, although he knew him not; for this is universal malice. (v) And upon the same principle, if a man, knowing that people are passing along the street, throw a stone likely to do injury, or shoot over a house or wall with intent to do hurt to people, and one is thereby slain, it is murder on account of the previous malice, though not directed against any particular individual: for it is no excuse that the party was bent upon mischief generally. reason of the felonious intention of stealing. (x) So, if a man set fire to a house, whereby a person in it is burnt to death. (y) And it was held, that if such offenders as were mentioned in the statute De malefactoribus in parvis, (z) killed the keeper, &c. it was murder in all, although it appeared that the keeper ordered them to stand, assaulted them first, and that they fled, and did not turn till one of the keeper's men had fired and hurt one of their companions. (a)

On an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner had set fire to a stack of straw in an enclosure in which was an outhouse or barn, but not adjoining to any house. While the fire was burning, the deceased was seen in the flames, and his body was afterwards found in the enclosure. It did not clearly appear whether he had been in the outhouse or merely lying on or by the side of the stack. There was no evidence who he was, or how or when he came there, nor that the prisoner had any idea that any one was or was likely to be there, and when he saw the deceased, he wanted to save him. It did not exactly appear how long the fire had been kindled before it was discovered, but very soon after it was discovered the deceased was seen in the flames. Bramwell, B. told the jury that 'the law laid down was that where a prisoner, in the course of committing a felony, caused the death of a human being, that was murder, even though he did not intend it. And though that may appear unreasonable, yet, as it is laid down as law, it is our duty to act upon it. The law, however, is that a man is not answerable except for the natural and probable result of his own act; and therefore, if you should not be satisfied that the deceased was in the farm or enclosure at the time the prisoner set fire to the stack, but came in afterwards, then, as his own act intervened between the death and the act of the prisoner, his

(x) Fost. 258, 259. Lord Coke, 3 Inst. 56, says, 'if the act be unlawful it is murder; as if A., meaning to steal a deer in the park of B., shoots at the deer, and by the glance of the arrow kills a boy that is hidden in a bush, this is murder; for that the act was unlawful,' and he cites Bract. Lib. 3. 120 b. And then he draws the distinction between shooting wild fowl and shooting at any tame fowl, and says, if the arrow by misadventure kills a man, it is murder; and cites for the latter position 3 Edw. 3, Coron. 354, 2 Hen. 4. 18, and 11 Hen. 7, 23. Lord Hale, 1 Hale, 38, cites 11 Hen. 7, 23, Br. Coron. 229, Proclamation, 12. 22 Ass. pl. 71, and see 1 Hale, 568. In Rex v. Plummer, Kel. 117, the question is discussed in the judgment of the C. J., and Lord Coke's dictum is explained to mean that if two men have a design to steal a hen, and one shoots at the hen for that purpose, and a man be killed, it is murder in both, because the design was felonious; and it is said that with that explanation the books cited do warrant that opinion. Forster, 258-9, cites 3 Inst. 56. and Kel. 117. There is, therefore, much in the books on the subject; and, with all deference to the opinions of others, the rule that anyone who deliberately attempts to commit a felony and thereby occasions death, is guilty of murder, seems to be right. If this were not the rule, any person might burn any man's house and him in it, and be liable to no punishment for causing the death; for it never could be proved that he knew that there was anyone in it. And a more salutary rule cannot be than that he who attempts to commit a felony shall be liable to the natural consequences of his felonious act.

The reason is the Act provides that, if after hue and cry made to stand, they will not yield, but flee or defend themselves, and the keepers kill them in taking them, they shall not be troubled in any way for it. Therefore all that the keepers did in this case was lawful, and consequently the killing was the killing of a party in the due execution of his duty.

death could not be the natural result of the prisoner's act. And in that view he ought to be acquitted on the present charge.' (b)

Also, where the intent is to do some great bodily harm to another, and death ensues, it will be murder; as if A. intend only to beat B. in anger, or from preconceived malice, and happen to kill him, it will be no excuse that he did not intend all the mischief that followed; for what he did was malum in se, and he must be answerable for all its consequences. He beat B. with an intention of doing him some bodily harm, and is therefore answerable for all the harm he did. (c) So if a large stone be thrown at one with a deliberate intention to hurt, though not to kill him, and by accident it kill him, or any other, this is murder. (d) If a wrongful act (an act which the party who commits it can neither justify nor excuse) be done under circumstances which show an intent to kill, or do any serious injury, or any general malice, the offence is murder. (e) But the nature of the instrument, and the manner of using it, as calculated to produce great bodily harm or not, will vary the offence in all such cases. (f)

Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased, being in liquor, had gone at night into a glass-house, and laid himself down upon a chest; and that while he was there asleep the prisoners covered and surrounded him with straw, and threw a shovel of hot cinders upon his belly; the consequence of which was that the straw ignited, and he was burnt to death: there was no evidence of express malice, but the conduct of the prisoners indicated an entire recklessness of consequences, hardly consistent with anything short of design. Patteson, J., adverted to the fact of there being no evidence of express malice, but told the jury that if they believed the prisoners really intended to do any serious injury to the deceased, although not to kill him, it was murder; but if they believed their intention to have been only to frighten him in sport, it was manslaughter. Where several join to do an unlawful act.

Where divers persons resolve generally to resist all opposers in the commission of any breach of the peace, and to execute it in such a manner as naturally tends to raise tumults and affrays, as by committing a violent disseisin with great numbers of people, or going to beat a man, or rob a park, or standing in opposition to the sheriff's posse, they must, when they engage in such bold dis-

(b) Reg. v. Horsey, 3 F. & F. 287. The natural and probable result of setting anything on fire is that it will burn whatever may happen to be in proximity to it during its progress, and not merely what happens to be so when the fire was lighted. If a man sets an internal engine, with a lighted fusee, the natural and probable consequence is that it will kill whoever is near it at the time it explodes, and it has never been doubted that this would be murder if a person was killed by it, however far off he was when the fusee was lighted. See also and consider the cases of poisoning at p. 739. The proper mode to look at cases of this kind is to suppose that the prisoner actually applied a light to each particular thing to which the fire extended at the very time the fire reached it. That is the legal effect of the prisoner's act, and he may be indicted for setting fire to every new subject-matter reached by the fire. Suppose a rick were set fire to, and the fire extended to a house, and that there was no one in the house when the rick was set on fire, but that when the fire reached the house there was a man in it; can it be doubted that this would be setting fire to a house with a man in it within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 2? The learned Baron's ruling therefore seems to have been incorrect.

turbances of the public peace, at their peril, abide the event of their actions. And therefore if in doing any of these acts they happen to kill a man, they are all guilty of murder. (h) But it should be observed, that in order to make the killing by any murder in all of those who are confederated together for an unlawful purpose, merely on account of the unlawful act done or in contemplation, it must happen during the actual strife or endeavour, or at least within such a reasonable time afterwards as may leave it probable that no fresh provocation intervened. (i)

And it should also be observed, that the fact must appear to have been committed strictly in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled; and therefore, if divers persons be engaged in an unlawful act, and one of them, with malice prepense against one of his companions, finding an opportunity, kill him, the rest are not concerned in the guilt of that act, because it had no connexion with the crime in contemplation. (k) So, where two men were beating another man in the street, and a stranger made some observation upon the cruelty of the act, upon which one of the two men gave him a mortal stab with a knife; and both the men were indicted as principals in the murder; although both were doing an unlawful act in beating the man, yet as the death of the stranger did not ensue upon that act, and as it appeared that only one of them intended any injury to the person killed, the Judges were of opinion that the other could not be guilty, either as principal or accessory. (l)

Where a party of smugglers were met and opposed by an officer of the Crown, and during the scuffle which ensued a gun was discharged by a smuggler, which killed one of his own gang, the question was, whether the whole gang were guilty of this murder; and it was agreed by the Court, that if the king's officer, or any of his assistants, had been killed by the shot, it would have been murder in all the gang; and also, that if it had appeared that the shot was levelled at the officer, or any of his assistants, it would also have amounted to murder in the whole of the gang, though an accomplice of their own were the person killed. (m) The point upon which this case turned was, that it did not appear from any of the facts found, that the gun was discharged in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled. (n) In another case the prisoners were hired by a tenant to assist him in carrying away his household furniture in order to avoid a distress. They accordingly assembled for this purpose armed with bludgeons and other offensive weapons; and a violent affray took place between them and the landlord of the house, who, accompanied on his part by another set of men, came to prevent the removal of the goods. The constable was called in and produced his authority, but could not induce them to disperse: and, while they were fighting in the street, one of the company, but which of them was not known, killed a boy who was standing at his father's door looking on, but totally unconcerned in the affray. The question was, whether this was murder in all the company; and Holt, C. J., and Pollexfen, C. J., were of opinion that it was murder in all the company, because they were all engaged in an unlawful act, by proceeding in the affray after the constable had interposed and commanded them to keep the peace; especially as the manner in which they originally assembled, namely, with offensive weapons and in a riotous manner, was contrary to law. (o) But the majority of the Judges held, that as the boy was found to be unconcerned in the affray, his having been killed by one of the company could not possibly affect the rest; for the homicide did not happen in prosecution of the illegal act. (p) And it seems that this opinion proceeded upon the ground that there was no evidence to show that the stroke by which the boy was killed was either levelled at any of the opposing party, or was levelled at him upon the supposition that he was one of the opponents, and therefore that it was not given in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled. (q)

The fact must appear to have been committed strictly in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled.

In these cases it seems that it is a question for the jury whether the act done was in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled, or independent of it and without any previous concert. The prisoners, eight in number, each having a gun, upon being found poaching by some keepers, who went towards them for the purpose of apprehending them, formed into two lines, and pointed their guns at the keepers, saying they would shoot them; a shot was then fired which wounded a keeper, but no other shot was fired: it was objected that it was clear that there was no common intent to shoot this man, because only one gun was fired, instead of the whole number. Vaughan, B. 'That is rather a question for the jury, but still on this evidence it is quite clear what the common purpose was. They all draw up in lines, and point their guns at the gamekeepers, and they are all giving their countenance and assistance to the one who actually fires the gun. If it could be shown that either of them separated himself from the rest, and showed distinctly that he would have no hand in what they were doing, the objection would have much weight in it.' (r) Two private watchmen seeing the prisoner and another man with two carts laden with apples, which they suspected had been stolen, went up to them, and one walked beside the prisoner, and one beside the other man, at some distance from each other, and while they were so going along, the prisoner's companion stepped back, and with a bludgeon wounded the watchman he had been walking with; Garrow, B., 'To make the prisoner a principal the jury must be satisfied that when he and his companion went out with a common illegal purpose of stealing apples, they also entertained the common guilty purpose of resisting to death, or with extreme violence, any persons who might endeavour to apprehend them: but if they had only the common purpose of stealing apples, and the violence of the prisoner's companion was merely the result of the situation in which he found himself, and proceeded from the impulse of the moment, without any previous concert, the prisoner will be entitled to an acquittal.' (s)

Where the whole of a party of poachers set upon and beat a keeper till he was senseless, and having left him lying on the ground, one of them after they had gone a little distance returned, and stole his money, it was holden that he alone was guilty of the stealing. (t) Where two poachers were apprehended by some gamekeepers, and being in custody called out to one of their companions, who came to their assistance and killed one of the gamekeepers, it was held that this was murder in all, though the blow was struck while the two were actually in custody, but that it would not have been so, if the two had acquiesced and remained passive in custody. (u)

Where four poachers were met by a keeper and his assistant, and after some words had passed, three of them ran in upon the keeper, knocked him down and stunned him; and when he recovered himself, he saw all of them coming by him, and one said, 'Damn 'em we've done 'em;' and when they had got two or three paces beyond him, one of them turned back and wounded the keeper in the leg, and then the men set off and ran away; Bolland, B., told the jury if they thought the prisoners were acting in concert, they were all equally guilty of inflicting the wound. (v)

Where, upon an indictment for maliciously cutting, the question was, how far one prisoner was concurring in the act of the other; Park, J., told the jury that, 'if three persons go out to commit a felony, and one of them, unknown to the others, puts a pistol in his pocket, and commits a felony of another kind, such as murder, the two who did not concur in this second felony will not be guilty thereof, notwithstanding it happened while they were engaged with him in the felonious act for which they went out.' (w)

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the six prisoners, who were shipmates, for some cause of offence unknown, chased a German sailor belonging to another ship through the streets, and as he took refuge from their attack against a railing, he was stabbed by one of them with a knife, of which wound he died in a few minutes. The evidence as to the hand by which the blow was given was very conflicting. Byles, J., told the jury that supposing they could fix upon the hand that stabbed, the first question would be what was his offence? The person who stabbed was clearly guilty of murder, whether he intended to kill or not. If he only intended to commit bodily harm, he was guilty of murder. The next question was in what condition were the other five men? The deceased sailor was leaning against some iron railings when the stab was given, but before that he had been assaulted in a barbarous and dastardly manner by these six men; but did the other men contemplate the use of the knife, or was it an independent act of the man who used it? They were all guilty of murder if they participated in a common design and intention to kill. If they should think that the others did not intend and design to kill, yet these others would also be guilty of murder if the knife was used in pursuance of one common design to use it, because then the hand that used the knife was the hand of all of them. Supposing there was no common design to use the knife, if being present at the moment of stabbing, they assented and manifested their assent by assisting in the offence, they were guilty of murder. First, then, there must be a common design to kill; secondly, there must be a common design to use a murderous instrument; and, thirdly, there must be presence at the time and assent and assistance in the use of the knife. If, however, they should think neither of these three modes of putting the case proved against the five, it would be their duty to find the stabber guilty and to acquit the others. (x)

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that more than nine men, of whom seven were armed with guns, were out at night in pursuit of game; and shots had been heard in one wood, and the prisoners were met in a meadow going towards another wood by a party of gamekeepers; the deceased had a flail, but none of them had any gun: the poachers drew up in a line, as one of them ordered them to do: one of them said, 'The first man that takes a step forward I will shoot;' the deceased called out, 'Oh, you would not be so cowardly as to shoot;' the man cried out, 'So help me God, I will.' The deceased said to his men, 'Are you ready?' and they made a rush at the prisoners, and the flail was heard to rattle and then the deceased was shot, but not by the man he was assailing. It was by no means clear who fired the shot. Byles, J., told the jury that whoever fired the shot was guilty of manslaughter, and assuming that it could not be ascertained who fired the shot, all who were present, and were parties to the act, were certainly guilty, and that if all were in a row when the gun was fired that was strong evidence of a common purpose to shoot; but it was for the jury to decide whether there was such a common purpose or not, or whether the gun was fired in consequence of a personal encounter between a keeper and the man who fired it. SEC. V.

Cases where the Killing takes place in consequence of some Lawful Act being criminally or improperly performed, or of some Act performed without Proper Authority.

DUE caution should be observed by all persons in the discharge of the business and duties of their respective stations, lest they should proceed by means which are criminal or improper, and exceed the limits of their authority. This will more especially require the attention of officers of justice; and should be kept in mind by those who have to administer correction in foro domestico, and by persons employed in those common occupations from which danger to others may possibly arise.

It has been shown in a former part of this Chapter, (a) that ministers of justice, when in the execution of their offices, are specially protected by the law: but it behoves them to take care that they do not misconduct themselves in the discharge of their duty, on pain of forfeiting such protection. Thus, though in cases civil or criminal, an officer may repel force by force, where his authority to arrest or imprison is resisted, and will be justified in so doing if death should be the consequence; (b) yet he ought not to come to extremities upon every slight interruption, nor without a reasonable necessity. (c) And if he should kill where no resistance is made, it will be murder: and it is presumed that the offence would be of the same magnitude if he should kill a party after the resistance is over and the necessity has ceased, provided that sufficient time has elapsed for the blood to have cooled. (d) And again, though where a felon flying from justice is killed by the officer in the pursuit, the homicide is justifiable if the felon could not be otherwise overtaken; (e) yet where a party is accused of a misdemeanor only, and flies from the arrest, the officer must not kill him, though there be a warrant to apprehend him, and though he cannot otherwise be overtaken; and if he do kill him, it will in general be murder. (f) So, in civil suits, if the party against whom the process is issued, fly from the officer endeavouring to arrest him, or if he fly after an arrest actually made, or out of custody in execution for debt, and the officer not being able to overtake him make use of any deadly weapon, and by so doing, or by other means, intentionally kill him in the pursuit, it will amount to murder. (g) And also in the case of impressing seamen, stated. Byles, J., is reported to have directed the grand jury that, 'as the poachers were not engaged in a felony, the use of the flail with violence might reduce the offence to manslaughter.' It is perfectly clear that there is no such distinction known to the law as to the manner of arrest between cases of felony and misdemeanor, where the right to arrest at the time and place, and by the person attempting it, exists; and an attack with such a dangerous instrument as a flail, in order to arrest anyone for a felony, would clearly reduce the offence to manslaughter; it is plain there was no reason for drawing any such distinction, and therefore the report is probably erroneous.

if the party fly, it is conceived that the killing by the officer in the pursuit to overtake him would be manslaughter at least, and in some cases murder, according to the rules which govern the case of misdemeanors; paying attention, nevertheless, to those usages which have prevailed in the sea-service in this respect, so far as they are authorized by the Courts, which have ordinary jurisdiction over such matters, and are not expressly repugnant to the laws of the land. (h)

If an officer make an arrest out of his proper district, (except as he may be authorized by some Act of Parliament,) or if an officer have no warrant or authority at all, he is no legal officer, nor entitled to the special protection of the law; and if he purposely kill the party for not submitting to such illegal arrest, it will be murder in all cases, at least where an indifferent person acting in the like manner, without any such pretence, would be guilty to that extent. (i) Thus where a warrant had been directed from the Admiralty to Lord Danby to impress seamen, and one Browning, his servant, without any warrant in writing, (k) impressed a person who was no seaman, and upon his trying to escape he killed him, it was adjudged murder. (l) And where the captain of a man of war had a warrant for impressing mariners, upon which a deputation was indorsed in the usual form to the lieutenant; and the mate, with the prisoner Dixon, and some others, but without either the captain or lieutenant, impressed one Anthony How, who never was a mariner but was servant to a tobacconist, and upon How making some resistance, and for that purpose drawing a knife, which he held in his hand, Dixon, with a large walking-stick, about four feet long, and a great knob at the end of it, gave How a violent blow on the side of his head, of which he died in about fourteen days; it was adjudged murder. The capture and detention of How were considered as unlawful on two accounts; first, because neither the captain nor lieutenant were present, and Dixon was no lawful officer for the purpose of pressing, nor an assistant to a lawful officer; secondly, because How was not a proper object to be impressed. It was lawful therefore, under these circumstances, for How to defend himself; and Dixon's killing him, in consequence of an unlawful capture and detention, was murder. (m) So if a court martial order a man to be flogged where they have no jurisdiction, and the flogging kills the man, the members who concurred in that order are guilty of murder. (n)

It is no excuse for killing a man that he was out at night as a ghost dressed in white for the purpose of alarming the neighbourhood, even though he could not otherwise be taken. The neighbourhood of Hammersmith had been alarmed by what was supposed to be a ghost; the prisoner went out with a loaded gun to take the ghost; and upon meeting with a person dressed in white, immediately shot him. McDonald, C. B., Rooke and Lawrence, Js., were clear that this was murder, as the person who appeared as a ghost was only guilty of a misdemeanor; and no one might kill him, though he could not otherwise be taken. The jury, however, brought in a verdict of manslaughter; but the Court said that they could not receive that verdict; and told the jury that if they believed the evidence they must find the prisoner guilty of murder; and if they did not believe the evidence, they should acquit the prisoner. The jury then found the prisoner guilty, and sentence was pronounced; but the prisoner was afterwards reprieved. (o)

Killing a person who is committing a misdemeanor.

Gaolers and their officers are under the same special protection as other ministers of justice; but in regard to the great power which they have, and, while it is exercised in moderation, ought to have, over their prisoners, the law watches their conduct with a jealous eye. If, therefore, a prisoner under their care die, whether by disease or accident, the coroner, upon notice of such death, which notice the gaoler is obliged to give in due time, ought to resort to the gaol; and there, upon view of the body, make inquisition into the cause of the death; and if the death was owing to cruel and oppressive usage on the part of the gaoler or any officer of his, or, to speak in the language of the law, to duress of imprisonment, it will be deemed wilful murder in the person guilty of such duress. (p) The person guilty of such duress will be the party liable to prosecution, because, though in a civil suit, the principal may in some cases be answerable in damages to the party injured through the default of the deputy; yet, in a capital prosecution, the sole object of which is the punishment of the delinquent, each man must answer for his own acts or defaults. (q)

Duress of imprisonment by gaolers.

A gaoler, knowing that a prisoner infected with the small-pox lodged in a certain room in the prison, confined another prisoner against his will in the same room. The second prisoner, who had not had the distemper, of which fact the gaoler had notice, caught the distemper, and died of it; this was holden to be murder. (r)

Huggins was warden of the Fleet prison, with power to execute the office by deputy, and appointed one Gibbon, who acted as deputy. Gibbon had a servant, Barnes, whose business it was to take care of the prisoners, and particularly of one Arne; and Barnes put Arne into a new-built room, over the common sewer, the walls of which were damp and unwholesome, and kept him without fire, chamber-pot, or other necessary convenience, for forty-four days, when he died. It appeared that Barnes knew the unwholesome situation of the room, and that Huggins knew the condition of the room fifteen days at least before the death of Arne, as he had been once present at the prison, and seen Arne under such duress of imprisonment, and turned away; at which time Barnes shut the door of the room, in which Arne continued till he died. It was found that Arne had sickened and died by duress of imprisonment, and that during the time Gibbon was deputy, Huggins sometimes acted as warden. Upon these facts the Court were clearly of opinion that Barnes was guilty of murder. But they thought that Huggins was not guilty, as it could not be inferred, from merely seeing the deceased once during his confinement, that Huggins knew that his situation was occasioned by the improper treatment, or that he consented to the continuance of it: and they said, that it was material that the species of duress, by which the deceased came to his death, could not be known by a bare looking-in upon him. Huggins could not know the circumstances under which he was placed in the room against his consent, or the length of his confinement, or how long he had been without the decent necessities of life: and it was likewise material that no application was made to Huggins, which perhaps might have altered the case. And the Court seemed also to think that as Barnes was the servant of Gibbon, and Gibbon had the actual management of the prison, the accidental presence of the principal would not amount to a revocation of the authority of the deputy. (s) in the execution of criminals.

With respect to the duty of officers in the execution of criminals, it has been laid down as a rule, that the execution ought not to vary from the judgment; for if it doth, the officer will be guilty of felony at least, if not of murder. (t) And in conformity to this rule it has been holden, that if the judgment be to be hanged, and the officer behead the party, it is murder; (u) and that even the King cannot change the punishment of the law by altering the hanging or burning into beheading, though, when beheading is part of the sentence, the King may remit the rest. (c) But others have thought, more justly, that this prerogative of the Crown, founded in mercy and immemorially exercised, is part of the common law; (w) and that though the King cannot by his prerogative vary the execution so as to aggravate the punishment beyond the intention of the law, yet he may mitigate the pain or infamy of it: and accordingly that an officer, acting upon a warrant from the Crown for beheading a person under sentence of death for felony, would not be guilty of any offence. (x) But the rule may apply to an officer varying from the judgment of his own head, and without warrant or the colour of authority. (y)

(y) It was, however, the practice, founded in humanity, when women were condemned to be burned for treason, to strangle them at the stake before the fire reached them, though the letter of the judgment was that they should be burnt in the fire till they were dead. Fost. 268. The 30 Geo. 3, c. 48, now directs that they shall be hanged as other offenders.

Parents, masters, and other persons having authority in foro domestico, may give reasonable correction to those under their care; and if death ensue without their fault, it will be no more than accidental death. But if the correction exceed the bounds of due moderation, either in the measure of it, or in the instrument made use of for that purpose, the death ensuing will be either murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances of the case. Where the fact is done with a dangerous weapon, improper for correction, and likely (the age and strength of the party being duly considered) to kill or maim; such as an iron bar, a sword, a pestle, or great staff; or where the party is kicked to the ground, his belly stamped upon, and so killed, it will be murder. (z) Thus, where a master had employed his apprentice to do some work in his absence, and on his return found it had been neglected, and thereupon threatened to send the apprentice to Bridewell, to which the apprentice replied, 'I may as well work there, as with such a master;' upon which the master struck the apprentice on the head with a bar of iron which he had in his hand, and the apprentice died of the blow; it was held murder: for if a father, master, or schoolmaster, correct his child, servant, or scholar, it must be with such things as are fit for correction, and not with such instruments as may probably kill them; otherwise, under pretence of correction, a parent may kill his child; and a bar of iron is no instrument of correction. (a)

On an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the prisoner, a schoolmaster, having the care of the deceased, a boy of thirteen or fourteen, wrote to his father, stating that the boy was obstinate, and that, were he his own child, he should, after warning him, as he had done, subdue his obstinacy, by chastising him severely, and, if necessary, he should do it again and again, and continue it again even if he held out for hours. The father replied, 'I do not wish to interfere with your plan.' On the night of the next day after this letter, the prisoner took the boy into a room downstairs, and beat him for about two hours, between ten and twelve, with a thick stick; using also a skipping rope. About midnight the prisoner was heard dragging or pushing the boy upstairs to his bedroom, and there he beat him again, until about half-past twelve, when the beating and crying suddenly stopped. About seven the next morning, the prisoner said he had found the boy dead, and almost stiffening. A medical examination showed that the thighs and other parts of the body were covered with bruises, and that there had been profuse bleeding and extravasation of blood caused by excessive and protracted beating, and that the immediate cause of death was exhaustion arising therefrom. The medical witnesses stated that upon the evidence, coupled with the prisoner's statement, the boy, at seven o'clock in the morning, must have been dead about six hours; so that their evidence went to show that he died about the time when the beating was heard suddenly to cease. The prisoner had not avowed the beating until its effects had been discovered by a post-mortem examination, and had sent the body home so closely wrapped up that the bruises were not detected until the coverings were removed in consequence of rumours prevailing. There was no post-mortem examination prior to the inquest, at which the surgeon, who was called in by the prisoner at seven o'clock, and who had only seen the boy's face, was examined, and the prisoner, who suggested that the boy had died of disease of the heart. The stick was at one end an inch thick; at the other it was edged with brass about the circumference of a sixpence, and there were holes in the shins of the deceased corresponding therewith, and which the medical witnesses thought must have been produced by poking therewith. The prisoner and his wife had been for some time going up and down stairs engaged in washing out the stains of blood in the night. Cockburn, C. J., 'By the law of England, a parent or a schoolmaster, who for this purpose represents the parent, and has the parental authority delegated to him, may, for the purpose of correcting what is evil in the child, inflict moderate and reasonable corporal punishment, always however with this condition, that it is moderate and reasonable. If it be administered for the gratification of passion or of rage, or if it be immoderate and excessive in its nature and degree, or if it be protracted beyond the child's powers of endurance, or with an instrument unfitted for the purpose and calculated to produce danger to life or limb; in all such cases the punishment is excessive, the violence is unlawful, and if death ensues it will be manslaughter' [at least]; and (after commenting on the evidence) 'It is true that the father authorized the chastisement, but he did not, and no law could, authorize an excessive chastisement. There can be no doubt that the prisoner thought the boy obstinate, but that did not excuse extreme severity and excessive punishment.' (b)

If persons, in pursuit of their lawful and common occupations, see danger probably arising to others from their acts, and yet persist, without giving sufficient warning of the danger, the death which ensues will be murder. Thus, if workmen throwing stones, rubbish, or other things from a house, in the ordinary course of their business, happen to kill a person underneath, the question will be, whether they deliberately saw the danger, or betrayed any consciousness of it. If they did, and yet gave no warning, a general malignity of heart may be inferred, (c) and the act will amount to murder from its gross impropriety. (d) So if a person driving a cart or other carriage, happen to kill, and it appear that he saw, or had timely notice of the mischief likely to ensue, and yet drove on, it will be murder. (e) The act is wilful and deliberate, and manifests a heart regardless of social duty. (f)

SEC. VI.

Of the Indictment, Trial, &c.

ALTHOUGH the prisoner may be charged with murder by the inquisition of the coroner, it is usual also to prefer an indictment against him. And it is said to be proper to frame an indictment for the offence of murder in all cases where the degree of the offence is at all doubtful; (g) and unquestionably where there is any reasonable ground for supposing that the facts, as they will be given in evidence, may lead to the conclusion of the higher offence having been committed, it will be culpable not to prefer an indictment for murder. [549] Indictment.

With respect to the place in which the indictment is to be preferred, it will be necessary to state some of the legislative enactments by which trials for murder are regulated.

Murder, like all other offences, must regularly, according to the common law, be inquired of in the county in which it was committed. It appears, however, to have been a matter of doubt at the common law, whether, when a man died in one county of a stroke received in another, the offence could be considered as having been completely committed in either county: (h) but by the 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 24, s. 2, it was enacted, that the trial should be in the county where the death happened. That statute was, however, repealed by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64; sec. 12 of which, 'for the more effectual prosecution of offences committed near the boundaries of counties, or partly in one county and partly in another,' enacts, 'that where any felony or misdemeanor shall be committed on the boundary or boundaries of two or more counties, or within the distance of five hundred yards of any such boundary or boundaries, or shall be begun in one county and completed in another, every such felony or misdemeanor may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished, in any of the said counties, in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein.' In what place the offender must be indicted. 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12. Where the cause of death is in one county and the death in another.

It has been held under this section that, where the blow is given in one county, and the death takes place in another, the trial may be in the latter county. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, found by the grand jury of the county of the city of Worcester, alleging the blow which caused the death to have been struck in the county of Worcester, it was objected that the words 'begun in one county and completed in another,' did not apply to such a case, as the word 'completed' necessarily imported some active and continuing agency in the person committing the offence in the county where the felony was completed; but it was held that the clause did extend to this case. Bellamy, the clerk of arraigns, had consulted Mr. J. Littledale about this case, and he thought that the indictment ought to be preferred in the city, and it had been so preferred accordingly. C. S. G.

Sec. 12 only applies to trials in counties, and does not extend to limited jurisdictions within counties. Where, therefore, a larceny was committed in the city of London, but within five hundred yards of the boundary of the county of Surrey and of the borough of Southwark; it was held that the offence could not be tried by the quarter sessions for the borough of Southwark. (k)

Accessories.

The trial of accessories to any felony is now provided for by the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 94, s. 7, which is to be found in its proper place. (l)

If a person be stricken and die in the county of A., and the body be found in B., it is to be removed into A. for the coroner of that county to take the inquest. (m)

Cause of death in one county, death in another.

Where an inquisition was taken by the coroner of the borough of Reading, on the oaths of jurors of that borough, in Reading, upon a body lying dead in the borough, and it appeared that the death was accidentally caused by the deceased falling in the county of Berks from a carriage, and that the deceased died in the borough, the Court of Queen's Bench quashed the inquisition, on the ground that the coroner of the borough had no jurisdiction to inquire into the cause of a death occasioned by an accident happening out of the borough. (n)

Coroner only within whose jurisdiction the body is lying dead shall hold the inquest.

In consequence of the preceding decision, the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 12, s. 1, 'An Act for the more convenient holding of Coroners' Inquests,' was passed. This Act recites that 'it often happens that it is unknown where persons lying dead have come by their deaths, and also that such persons may die in other places than those in which the cause of death happened,' and enacts 'that the coroner only within whose jurisdiction the body of any person upon whose death an inquest ought to be holden shall be lying dead shall hold the inquest, notwithstanding that the cause of death did not arise within the jurisdiction of such coroner; and in the case of any body found dead in the sea, or any creek, river, or navigable canal within the flowing of the sea, where there shall be no deputy-coroner for the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, the inquest shall be holden only by the coroner having jurisdiction in the place where the body shall be first brought to land.'

In detached parts of counties.

Sec. 2, 'For the purpose of holding coroners' inquests, every detached part of a county, riding, or division shall be deemed to be within that county, riding, or division by which it is wholly surrounded, or, where it is partly surrounded by two or more counties, ridings, or divisions, within that one with which it has the longest common boundary.' (o)

Where trials are to be had.

Sec. 3, 'If a verdict of murder or manslaughter, or as accessory before the fact to any murder, shall be found by the jury at any such inquest, against any person or persons, the coroner holding the said inquest, and the justices of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol

(n) Reg. v. Great Western Railway Company, 3 Q. B. 333. The Court held that the 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 24, did not apply to an accidental death. That statute had been repealed by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 32, but this was not perceived either by the Bar or the Court. The question ought to have been determined with reference to the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12, and if it had, probably the decision would have been the same, as that section clearly does not apply to accidental deaths.

(o) This provision is not altered by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 61, s. 1.

Delivery for the county, city, district, or place in which such inquest shall be holden, and all other persons, shall have the same powers respectively for the commitment, trial, and execution of the sentence of the person or persons so charged as they now by law possess with regard to the commitment, trial, and execution of the sentence upon any person or persons committed and tried within the jurisdiction where the death happened.'

But where, after the passing of this Act, a person was found drowned in the river Medway, within the concurrent jurisdiction (exclusive of all others) of the coroner for the city of Rochester and the Admiralty, and the body was first brought to land in the county of Kent, beyond that jurisdiction, and placed in a hospital there, it was held that the coroner's jury of the city could not view the body at such place for the purpose of an inquest, and that an inquisition taken on such view was a nullity. (p) But where the cause of death and the death were in Surrey, and the body was brought into the city of London, where the coroner's inquest was held, and the prisoner tried on the inquisition at the Central Criminal Court, it seems to have been considered that the inquisition was rightly taken. (q)

It has since been held that it is no objection to a coroner's inquisition taken in Warwickshire, where the death occurred and the body lay, that it appears by it that the cause of death occurred in Staffordshire. (r)

By the 26 Hen. 8, c. 6, it is enacted, that murder and other felonies committed in Wales may be inquired of and tried upon an indictment in the next adjoining English county where the King's writ runneth: and Herefordshire has been holden to be the next adjoining English county to South Wales, and Shropshire to North Wales: (s) but it has been considered as a doubtful point in what place the trial ought to be, supposing the stroke given in an English county, and the death in Wales. (t)

There are also statutes which relate to the trial of murder, and other offences which have been committed upon the sea, and either within the King's dominions or without.

The 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, s. 1, enacts that all felonies, murders, &c., committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral has or pretends to have power, authority, or jurisdiction, shall be inquired, tried, &c., in such shires and places in the realm as shall be limited by the King's commission, in like form as if such offences had been committed upon the land. The proceedings upon this statute and the extent of the Admiralty jurisdiction have been already considered: (u) it may, however, be again mentioned in this place, that by the 15 Rich. 2, c. 3, the admiral has jurisdiction given to him to inquire 'of the death of a man, and of a mayhem done in great ships hovering in the main

By the 46 Geo. 3, c. 54, all murders and other offences committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, &c., where the admiral has jurisdiction, may be inquired of and tried, according to the common course of the laws of the realm used for offences committed upon the land within the realm and not otherwise, in any of his Majesty's islands, plantations, colonies, dominions, forts, or factories, under the King's commission: and the commissioners are to have the same powers for such trial within any such island, &c., as any commissioners appointed under the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, would have for the trial of offences within the realm. The provisions of this Act are extended by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 53, to murders and manslughters committed in places not within his Majesty's dominions. It enacts, that murders and manslughters committed on land at the settlement in the bay of Honduras, by any person residing or being within the settlement, and in the islands of New Zealand and Otaheite, or within any other islands, countries, or places not within his Majesty's dominions, nor subject to any European state or power, nor within the territory of the United States of America, by the master or crew of any British ship or vessel, or any of them, or by any person sailing in or belonging thereto, or that shall have sailed in and belonged to, and have quitted any British ship or vessel to live in any of the said islands, &c., or that shall be there living, may be tried and punished in any of his Majesty's islands, plantations, colonies, &c., by the King's commission, issued by virtue of the 46 Geo. 3, c. 54, in the same manner as if such offences had been committed upon the high seas. (y) This clause is framed from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 10 (I.). By the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, any person charged with any offence specified in this clause might be examined and committed by any justice of the place where the person so charged was, and thereupon a special commission was to be issued for the trial of such person. By the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 10, where any person was charged in Ireland with any offence specified in this clause, he might be examined and committed by any justice of the place where the person so charged was, and thereupon he might be tried in that place in the same manner as if his offence had been there committed. This was a much better provision than that in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, as it got rid of the necessity for a special commission, and avoided a difficulty which was very likely to arise under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7; for the special commission issued under that section recited the offence charged before the justice, and authorized the trial for that offence, and a fatal variance might well arise on the trial between the facts proved and the offence charged before the justice. The present section is substantially the same as the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 10, but uses the terms of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 8, and under it the party charged may be examined before any justice of the place where he is, and tried in the same place. The words 'dealt with' apply to justices of the peace; 'inquired of' to the grand jury; 'tried' to the petit jury; and 'determined and punished' to the Court; as was held by Lord Wensleydale in Rex v. Ruck, 1 Russ. C. & M. 827. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7; and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 10 (I.), were confined to accessories after the fact in manslaughter, but the present clause is so framed as to include an accessory before the fact in that offence, wherever there can be such an accessory, as to which see post, Manslaughter. This clause was carefully framed in order to remove any question as to the killing of a foreigner being within it; and instead of the words of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, 'where any of his Majesty's subjects shall be charged in England with any murder or manslaughter, or with being accessory before the fact to any murder, &c.,' (which, from their collocation, might afford an argument that no murder was within the clause unless it were committed by a British subject, and therefore a British subject would not be within it if he were accessory to a murder by an alien), the wording of this clause has been adopted so as to include an accessory to any murder by whomsoever committed. See the note to the clause for conspiracy to murder, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, post.

33 Hen. 8, of murders committed by subjects of this country in foreign states.

Though the 33 Hen. 8 was not confined to offences committed within the King's dominions, yet, in a case where a prisoner at war abroad had entered on board an English merchant ship, and whilst in that capacity had committed an offence upon an Englishman in a foreign country, it was decided that he could not be tried for it here under that statute, on the ground that he could not be deemed a subject of this country. The offender, Depardo, was a Spaniard, and taken prisoner at sea, and whilst abroad, volunteered on board an Indiaman, and received the usual bounty and part of his pay for about three months, which he served on board the Indiaman, and the Indiaman was lying at Canton in a part of the Canton river, about a third of a mile in width, within the tideway, at the distance of about eighty miles from the sea; the prisoner went ashore with the deceased, an Englishman, and there mortally wounded the deceased, who was carried on board ship, and died there the next day. Upon a case reserved, it was urged, that the prisoner was not liable to be tried here, because he never became subject to the laws of this country; that he was not so by birth, and did not become so by entering on board the Indiaman. No judgment was given, but the prisoner was discharged. (a)

But it was holden that a British subject was indictable under the 33 Hen. 8, for the murder of another British subject, though the murder were within the dominions of a foreign state; and that the indictment need not allege in terms that either the deceased or the offender were British subjects: the statement that the person murdered was at the time in the King's peace, being considered a sufficient allegation that he was a British subject; and the conclusion in the indictment that the offence was against the King's peace, being considered as showing sufficiently that the offender was a British subject. The indictment charged, in substance, that the prisoner, at Lisbon, in the kingdom of Portugal, in parts beyond the seas without England, one H. G., in the peace of God and of our lord the King, then and there being, feloniously did assault, shoot, and murder, against the peace of our said lord the King. After conviction, it was objected—1st, that the offence being out of the King's dominions, and within the dominions of a foreign state, was not triable under the 33 Hen. 8; and, 2nd, that the prisoner and the deceased should have been stated to have been subjects of our lord the King at the time. But, after argument, the Judges held that the offence was triable here, though committed in a foreign kingdom, the prisoner and the deceased being both subjects of this realm at the time; and that the stating H. G. to be in the King's peace at the time, sufficiently imported that he was the King's subject at the time; and that the statement that this was against the King's peace, sufficiently imported that the prisoner was also a subject of this realm at that time. (b) But (a) Rex v. Depardo, 1 Taunt. 26; R. & R. 134. This case was misstated in the former editions. It is clear the case fell within no statute, as the wound was on shore, and the death within the Admiralty jurisdiction. See Rex v. de Mattos, post, p. 760; and Rex v. Combes, post, p. 762. According to R. & R., the indictment was for manslaughter.

(b) Rex v. Sawyer. MS. Bayley, J.; R. & R. 294; and 2 C. & K. 101. In the latter report there is a very full account given of the previous cases. Another objection was that the indictment ought to have concluded contra formam statuti: but that was also overruled.

it was considered that an indictment upon the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, must aver, that the prisoner and deceased were subjects of his Majesty, but that the declarations of the prisoner were evidence to go to the jury to prove this fact. The indictment charged the murder to have been committed 'at Boulogne, in the kingdom of France, to wit, at the parish of St. Mary-le-bow, in the ward of Cheap,' &c. The grand jury objected to finding the bill, as it stated the death to have occurred in two different places. Bayley, J. (having conferred with Bosanquet, J. and the Recorder), directed the words 'to wit, at the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, in the ward of Cheap,' &c., to be struck out. His Lordship also said, that it was deemed by the Court to be necessary to have inserted in the bill an allegation that the prisoner and the deceased were subjects of his Majesty; and the bill was so amended accordingly. Upon the trial it appeared that the deceased was killed in a duel at Boulogne, and that he was an Englishman, born at Islington; and the prisoner had said he was an Irishman, and had come from Kilkenny. It was objected that, under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it was necessary to prove that the parties were natural-born subjects of his Majesty; the present Act differed from the 33 Hen. 8, c. 23, the words of which were 'any person or persons.' It never could have been intended that this Act should apply to foreigners domiciled in England, or naturalized either by Act of Parliament, or by service to the state. That it was necessary to prove, by some one acquainted with the fact, where the prisoner was born, which was a fact the prisoner could not know of his own knowledge. But it was held, that the declaration of the prisoner, unexplained, was, as against himself, evidence to go to the jury; and the case was left to the jury to say, whether they were satisfied by the evidence that the prisoner was a British born subject; for that they must be quite satisfied that such was the fact before they could pronounce him guilty. (c)

The indictment must state that the prisoner and the deceased were British subjects.

Where an indictment for manslaughter, stated that the prisoner being a subject of his Majesty, on land out of the United Kingdom, to wit, at Zanzibar, in the East Indies, did make an assault on J. K., and did give him divers mortal wounds, &c., of which he died, at Zanzibar aforesaid, and it appeared that the prisoner, a Spaniard, being in England, entered into certain articles to serve in a ship bound on a voyage to the Indian seas, and elsewhere, on a seeking and trading voyage (not exceeding three years' duration), and back to the United Kingdom, and on the ship's arrival at Zanzibar, an island in the Indian seas, under the dominion of an Arab king, the captain left the vessel, and set up in trade there, and engaged the prisoner (who was a black, and said to be by birth the son of a governor on another part of the African coast), to act as interpreter, the new captain not requiring his services, but the rest of the crew not consenting. The ship went one or two short voyages without the prisoner, and having returned to anchor in a roadstead, a few hundred yards from Zanzibar, and the crew being allowed to go on shore, some dispute arose between the prisoner and the deceased, who was one of the crew, which led to the blows on the land, of which the deceased

(c) Rex v. Helsham, 4 C. & P. 394, coram Bayley and Bosanquet, JJ., and Knowlys, R.

afterwards died on board the ship. It was held that there was no evidence of the prisoner being a British subject or under British protection. To claim his allegiance, it must at least be shown, that he was under British protection. And although he was on board a British ship for a time, yet it seemed as if the articles were abandoned, and he was living on shore, and had been so for months. And, secondly, that the offence was alleged to have been committed on land out of the United Kingdom, but though the blows were given on land, the death took place on board ship, and there was no clause in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 3, providing for such a case. (d)

A British subject might be tried under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, for the murder of a foreigner out of the Queen's dominions.

The prisoner was convicted on an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, for murder. The murder was committed at Smyrna. The prisoner, a native of Malta, of the age of twenty-one, was residing at Smyrna, under a passport from the Governor of Malta. The person murdered was a Dutchman. Malta is part of Her Majesty's dominions. Upon a case reserved it was contended that it was necessary, under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, to constitute the offence of murder or manslaughter that the person killed should be a British subject: but the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. (e)

A case which excited great interest was tried under the former clause. In it the prisoner was charged as accessory before the fact in England to a murder committed in France; (f) and many points were taken at the close of the case, and reserved. (g)

(d) Rex v. M. A. de Mattos, 7 C. & P. 458, Vaughan and Brougham, JJ. It was doubted in this case by Rolfe, J., whether the limitation put upon the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7, in Rex v. Holburn, was correct, and the Court seem to have thought that that construction was too narrow. Vaughan, J., in charging the grand jury said, 'there are other ways which may constitute a man a British subject; as, for instance, he may owe allegiance for protection:' and the case was decided on the ground that the prisoner was not a British subject in any sense of those words. C. S. G.

(e) Reg. v. Azzopardi, 2 M. C. C. R. 288; 1 C. & K. 203. It will be seen that the new clause expressly includes the killing of an alien.

(f) The first count alleged that Orsini, Gomez, and Rudio at Paris murdered N. Batty; and that the prisoner incited, &c., them to commit the murder; the second count was similar, but described the deceased as unknown. The third count was framed in the old form before the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, by the Editor; because he thought it might be contended that the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, did not extend to indictments against accessories; and it alleged an assault, &c., by the principals, and charged the prisoner with inciting, &c. The fourth count charged the prisoner, being a subject of the Queen, with murdering Batty at Paris. The fifth was like the fourth, but described the deceased as unknown.

(g) Reg. v. Bernard, 1 F. & F. 240. The points were: 1. That the prisoner was not one of her Majesty's subjects within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 7. 2. The prisoner was not an accessory before the fact to any murder within that section. 3. There was no proof of any murder having been committed within that section. 4. That the murder was committed by aliens on aliens in France. 5. No evidence of acts done by the prisoner on land out of the United Kingdom, and without the Queen's dominions, or of any act done by any other person in pursuance of any authority from him on land out of the United Kingdom and without the Queen's dominions, was receivable in evidence on this trial. 6. That the principal offence of murder charged in the first three counts was not alleged to have been committed by any of her Majesty's subjects. 7. That by the special commission the Court had only jurisdiction to try the prisoner as accessory before the fact, and had no jurisdiction to try the prisoner as principal. 8. That the prisoner, being an alien, could not be tried as principal for a murder alleged in the 4th and 5th counts to have been committed at Paris. As to the 1st objection, it is clear that a foreigner resident in England is a subject of the Queen; all the authorities prove that rule in general, and 1 Hale 542, and Courteen's case, Hob. R. 270, are express that a statute

Where a person was struck, &c. upon the high seas, and died upon shore, it was holden that the admiral had no cognizance of the offence by virtue of his commission. (h) And it was doubtful whether such offence could be tried at common law: (i) the 2 Geo. 2, c. 21, therefore made provisions for such cases, but that Act was repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, which was repealed by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 10, 'Where any person being feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt upon the sea, or at any place out of England or Ireland, shall die of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt in England or Ireland, or being feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt at any place in England or Ireland, shall die of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt upon the sea, or at any place out of England or Ireland, every offence committed in respect of any such case, whether the same shall amount to the offence of murder or of manslaughter, or of being accessory to murder or manslaughter, may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in the county or place in England or Ireland in which such death, stroke, poisoning, or hurt shall happen, in the same manner in all respects as if such offence had been wholly committed in that county or place.' (j)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was a Frenchman by birth, and a naturalized citizen of the United States, and not a subject of the Queen. He shipped on board an American ship at New York, and signed articles to serve as a seaman therein, and so did the deceased, who was a German by birth, and not a subject of the Queen. The ship was American owned, commanded by an American master, and sailed under the flag of the United States. The prisoner during the voyage to Liverpool exercised much cruelty to the deceased, of which he died in a hospital in Liverpool on the same day the ship arrived there; the last act of cruelty was committed on the high seas four days before the ship arrived at Liverpool; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was not liable to be tried in England under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 8, as that section was obviously intended to prevent a defeat of justice, which, without it, might have arisen from the difficulty of trial where the death occurred in a different place from that at which the blow causing it was given; and that section ought not therefore to be construed as making a homicide cognizable in this country by reason only of the death occurring here, unless it would have been so cognizable in case the death had ensued at the place where the blow was given, which the homicide would have been, in this particular case, by sec. 8, if the offender had been a British subject, but not otherwise. In this case the injury which caused the death was inflicted by one foreigner upon another on board a foreign vessel upon the high seas, and, consequently, if death had then and there followed, no offence cognizable by the law of this country would have taken place. Where a person standing on the shore of a harbour fired a loaded musket at a revenue cutter which had struck upon a sand-bank in the sea, about a hundred yards from the shore, by which another was maliciously killed on board the boat, it was holden that the trial must be in the Admiralty Court, and not at common law. (n) This enactment is framed on the similar clauses contained in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 77; 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 43; 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 32; 9 Geo. 4, c. 55, s. 74 (l); 9 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 55 (l); and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 41 (l); together with the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2. Some of these enactments simply provide for the trial of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty; whilst others provide in addition, that the offences mentioned in the Act, which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature, and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland. It seems clear that, wherever an Act creates new offences, this is the proper enactment; for, though in the case of offences against the laws of nature and nations, such as murder or piracy committed on the seas, the general course of legislation has been simply to provide for their trial, and no doubt correctly, because, in the eye of the law of England, they were offences of the same nature as if they had been committed on land in England, yet it may well be doubted whether that be sufficient in the case of newly created offences; and it is certainly much safer to have the provision with which this clause commences. The 39 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 1, no doubt provides generally, that every offence committed upon the high seas shall be of the same nature, &c., as if it had been committed on shore, but it is by no means clear that that enactment applies to any offence created by a subsequent statute, and it was much better not to leave the matter open to any such question. In Ireland it was necessary to issue a special commission under the 11, 12, & 13 Jac. 1, c. 2 (l); and 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 14, s. 4 (l), for the trial of all offences committed on the seas; but in England such offences might be tried under the ordinary commissions of Oyer and Terminer, or Gaol Delivery, by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2. The present section follows that Act in providing for the trial and form of indictment in such cases, and renders the law the same in both countries.

with the assistance of the police of Hamburg arrested him there, and brought him against his will on board an English steamer, in order that he might be tried for the larceny. The steamer left, the prisoner being in irons, and whilst the steamer was on the high seas, he shot the officer, who died of the wound. If the killing had been by an Englishman in England, it would have been murder. It was contended that as there was no extradition treaty between England and Hamburg, the arrest and detention were illegal, and the offence only manslaughter; but it was held, on a case reserved, that where the killing was done with the intent of preserving liberty, the crime was reduced to manslaughter; but it must be taken here that the prisoner killed the officer, not to obtain his liberty, but out of revenge and malice prepense; in which case it is murder even if the custody were unlawful. For the prisoner, a foreigner, was in an English ship, and was under the protection of the English laws, and therefore owed obedience to those laws, and was guilty of the crime of murder against those laws — that is to say, he shot a detective officer, not for the purpose of obtaining his liberation, but for revenge and of malice prepense. We have already dealt with many cases occurring within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, and it is sufficient to refer to that part of the work in this place. (p)

A few of the general rules relating to the form of the indictment may be mentioned in this place.

Form of the indictment.

If the name of the party killed be known, it should be correctly stated in the indictment; but it is sufficient to describe a party by the name by which he is commonly known. (q) A peer should properly be described only by his Christian name, and his name of dignity; as James, Duke of G. (r) But it seems that he may be described by his surname also; as William Byron, Baron Byron. (s) And although the proper way to describe a baron be to describe him by his Christian name, and his degree in the peerage, as William Baron, B., yet it is sufficient if he be described as William Lord B. (t) If the name of the party killed be not known, it may be laid to be a certain person to the jurors unknown. (u) Where a party has a name, an indictment must either state the name or that the name was unknown to the jurors. An indictment stated that the prisoner murdered 'an infant male child, aged about six weeks, and not baptized;' it was objected that the indictment was bad, as it neither stated the name of the child,

Description of the party killed.

(o) Reg. v. Sattler, D. & B. C. C. 525; see ante, p. 160. Hamburg is sixty miles from the sea, but the tide flows higher up than the place where the steamer was when the prisoner was put on board. The questions reserved were, 'Was the custody of the prisoner on board the steamer lawful, and is there any distinction as to the times when the steamer was in the river Elbe, and whilst she was upon the high seas?' [On this the Court gave no opinion.] And, 'Supposing the custody not to have been lawful, was the killing necessarily only manslaughter?'

nor that the name was unknown to the jurors; and, upon a case reserved, the Judges held that the objection was good, and the judgment was arrested. (v) But where an indictment alleged that the prisoner, a single woman, on the 27th day of August did bring forth a male child alive, and that she afterwards on the day and year aforesaid made an assault, &c., on the said child; it was objected that the indictment was bad, as it neither stated the name of the child, nor that its name was unknown: but Coleridge, J., overruled the objection on the ground that there was no presumption that an illegitimate child had any name, as it could only gain a name by reputation, and that to state that its name was unknown assumed that it had acquired a name; and this decision was held right. (w) So where the prisoners were indicted for the murder of 'a certain illegitimate male child, then lately before born of the body of' one of them, it was held right; for it was the case of a party who had never acquired a name, and the indictment identified the party by showing the name of the parent. (x) A bastard must not be described by his mother's name till he has gained that name by reputation. Frances Clarke was indicted for the murder of George Lakeman Clark, a base-born infant male child, aged three weeks. The child was her's, and had been christened George Lakeman, the father's name. The murder was proved, but there was no evidence that the child had ever been called Clark; and, on a case reserved, the Judges held that, as it had not obtained the mother's name by reputation, it was improperly called Clark in the indictment; and that as there was nothing but the name to identify it in the indictment, the conviction could not be supported. (y) Upon an indictment for the murder of 'a certain female child whose name to the jurors was unknown,' it appeared that the child had not been baptized, but the prisoner had said she should like it to be called 'Mary Ann,' and had called it 'her Mary Ann' at one time, and 'Little Mary' at another; the father was a baptist, and the child was a bastard, and twelve days old: and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the child had not gained a name by reputation, and therefore the indictment was good. (z) And where an illegitimate child, three weeks old, had been baptized by the name of 'Eliza,' but no surname was mentioned at the time of baptism, and neither the register, nor any copy of it, was produced at the trial, and an indictment for murder described her as 'Eliza Waters,' Waters being the name of her mother; it was held, upon a case reserved, that the child had not acquired the name of Waters by reputation, and that the conviction was wrong. (a) Where, however, an indictment charged the murder of Emma Evans, and it appeared that the deceased was an illegitimate child born in a workhouse, and baptized on the 9th of September by the name of Emma, and drowned on the 11th of the same month, when about six weeks old, and that up to the time of the baptism she was not called by any name, but that from the 9th to the 11th of September she was called Emma Evans, Evans being the mother's name; it was held that there was sufficient evidence of reputation for the consideration of the jury, and that this case was distinguishable from the last, because there was no evidence there that the child was ever called Waters at all. (b) Where one count described the child murdered as Lewis Drake; another as Lewis Tavern, and a third as a certain bastard male child called Lewis; the prisoner was the mother of the child, and sometimes called it Lewis, and by that name alone it had been baptized. It had been put out to nurse by its mother, who then went by the name of Tavern; the nurse used to call it Lewis, and when she learnt the mother's name was Drake, she called it Lewis Drake when speaking of it to other persons. The child was about two years old. There was no proof that the prisoner was married, and her brother had never heard of her marriage; but she had been absent from him thirteen years. It was held that there was no evidence of the child being Lewis Tavern; but that the case must go to the jury as to the two other names. As to the name of Lewis the child went by that name and was baptized by it; and it was for the jury to say whether, from the evidence they were not satisfied that the prisoner was never married; she went by her maiden name of Drake; she pleaded to that name in the indictment, and was there described as a single woman, and her brother never heard of her marriage. Whether all this might not satisfy the jury that the child was a bastard it was for them to decide, but undoubtedly there was evidence for them to consider. (c) The prisoner was indicted for the murder of her infant child, which was described in one count as Harriet Stroud, and in another as a female infant of tender age, whose name is to the jurors unknown. The prisoner, a single woman, gave birth to the child on the 16th of June, and it was called Harriet, and was baptized by that name on the 16th of July; no copy of the register was given in evidence; but it was said that the child was baptized by the name of Harriet, and not Harriet Stroud, and there was no evidence that she had ever been called by any name except Harriet; and the description was held wrong; the proper description would have been Harriet, the base-born child of the prisoner. The want of description is only excused where the name cannot be known. (d) Where an indictment for murder described the deceased as a certain infant female child not named, it was held sufficient; for though 'not baptized' would not have been enough, 'not named,' which means that she had acquired no name, by baptism or usage, was quite sufficient. (e) Where the prisoner was indicted for killing William Scarborough, and he was the illegitimate son of the prisoner, and four years of age, and generally called 'William' or 'Coley,' after his reputed father; but frequently spoken of as 'Sarah Scarborough's child,' and sometimes, his aunt said, she might have heard him called ‘William Scarborough;’ it was held that there was some evidence to go to the jury that the deceased, being Sarah Scarborough’s bastard, and being frequently and generally addressed as William, had also acquired by reputation the name of William Scarborough; and a party may acquire more names than one by reputation, and he may be indifferently described by either in an indictment. Where there was no evidence of the name of the deceased as stated in two counts, and the third count described her as ‘a certain woman whose name is to the jurors unknown,’ and it appeared that the prisoner had asked for lodgings in Oxford ‘for himself and his wife,’ and the prisoner came with the deceased to the lodgings and they lived there as husband and wife for three or four days, and when taken up by the marshal the prisoner was asked if he had a wife in Oxford, and he said he had; but on the marshal’s saying that she was dead, the prisoner replied ‘she is not my wife, she is a woman I have been travelling with for the last eight months.’ Erskine, J., held, that if the jury were satisfied that she was not the wife of the prisoner, and that the name could not be ascertained by any reasonable diligence, the description was right; but if the jury should think that she was the prisoner’s wife, the description was wrong, for she ought then to have been described by the surname of the prisoner. (g)

Name may be amended.

Where a child was described as Annie Welton, and no evidence of any name was adduced: Byles, J., amended the indictment by inserting ‘a certain female child whose name is to the jurors unknown,’ under the 14 & 15 Viet. c. 100, s. 1, which, his Lordship said, should have a wide construction. (h)

Indictment for murder or manslaughter.

In other respects great particularity was required formerly in an indictment for murder. It was necessary to allege the manner of the death and the means by which it was caused, and many other particulars; but this led to so many acquittals wholly beside the merits of the case, that a simple form of indictment was rendered sufficient by the 14 & 15 Viet. c. 100, s. 4, which was repealed by the 24 & 25 Viet. c. 95; but by the 24 & 25 Viet. c. 100, s. 6, ‘In any indictment for murder or manslaughter, or for being an accessory to any murder or manslaughter, it shall not be necessary to set forth the manner in which or the means by which the death of the deceased was caused, but it shall be sufficient in any indictment for murder to charge that the defendant did feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought kill and murder the deceased; and it shall be sufficient in any indictment for manslaughter to charge that the defendant did feloniously kill and slay the deceased; and it shall be sufficient in any indictment against any accessory to any murder or manslaughter to charge the principal with the murder or manslaughter (as the case may be) in the manner herein-before specified, and then to charge the defendant as an accessory in the manner heretofore used and accustomed.’ (i)

The indictment was for attempting to drown the child.

(i) This clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Viet. c. 100, s. 4, which applied only to indictments for murder and manslaughter, and a serious doubt was entertained whether in an indictment against

There can be no doubt that, where several join in a murder, both the principal in the first and the principal in the second degree may be charged that they feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought murdered the deceased; and thus the difficulties which arose in first charging the principal in the first degree, and then alleging that the principal in the second degree was present aiding and assisting, may be avoided. And as the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, (h) has made accessories before the fact liable to be indicted as principals, it is equally clear that an indictment may charge an accessory before the fact and a principal in the same manner in which we have stated that two principals may be charged. And there is this great advantage in adopting each of these courses; that on such an indictment it is quite immaterial which of the prisoners was principal in the first degree in the one case, or whether the party were accessory before the fact or a principal in the other case, and consequently the jury will be relieved from considering these questions. (l)

This clause has made it quite unnecessary to retain in this chapter many cases which were decided on the allegations in the indictments which are rendered unnecessary by it, as well as on the questions which had arisen whether those allegations were supported by the evidence.

This clause has also got rid of the difficulty of proving what the cause of death was, as it is clear that, if the jury are satisfied that the deceased was killed by any means, that is sufficient, although it may be impossible to prove what those means were.

It was always necessary to state, that the act by which the death was occasioned was done feloniously, and especially that it an accessory to murder or manslaughter, where the accessory was charged as an accessory and not as a principal, it might not still be necessary to adopt the old form of indictment, and in order to render that course unnecessary the new parts of this section were introduced.

The word 'indictment' includes a coroner's inquisition whereby any person is charged with murder or manslaughter, or as an accessory before the fact to either of those offences; indeed, it is the term most appropriately applied to such an inquisition; for the term inquisition includes all inquests before the coroner, whether terminating in a charge against any person or not, and whether held in a case of death or otherwise; e. g. in a case of treasure trove. All our best law writers apply the term indictment quite as often as inquisition to a coroner's inquisition charging anyone with any of the above offences. See 2 Inst. 32, 550; 4 Inst. 271; 2 Hale, P. C. 61, 64, 65, 66; 2 Hale, P. C. 130; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9, ss. 15, 16, 17, 22, 26, 35, and c. 25, ss. 6, 119, 128. Lord Coke also, 3 Inst. 134, and Hawkins, 2 Book, c. 25, passim, whilst treating of indictments introduce such coroners' inquisitions. In Borough v. Holcroft, 2 Leon. 160, and Wrote v. Wiggles, 4 Rep. 45, which were appeals of murder, the defendants pleaded ante factis acquit on cor- ners' inquisitions, and in the pleas the inquisitions appear to have been called indictments. The legislature also in the 1 & 2 Will. and Mary, c. 13, s. 5 (repealed by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 32), call a coroner's inquisition 'the inquisition or indictment.' And the 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 24, s. 2, (repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 1, from the 1st of June, 1828, except as to offences previously committed,) enacts that where any person shall be feloniously stricken or poisoned in one county and dies in another, an indictment found where the death happened, whether found before the coroner or before justices, &c., shall be good, &c.: and every coroner's inquest that has been held whilst the 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 24, continued in force, has been held by virtue of the word 'indictment' in that Act. So that there can be no doubt whatever that a coroner's inquisition which finds any person guilty of the above-mentioned offences is an indictment. In 1842 in Reg. v. Great Western Railway Company, 3 Q. B. 333, the Court applied the term indictment, in the 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 24, s. 2, to an inquisition for feloniously striking or poisoning. See also Reg. v. King, 2 Cox C. C. 95, and the Introduction to Greaves' Cr. Acts, p. xvi. 2d. Ed.

was done of malice aforethought, (m) which, as we have already seen, is the great characteristic of the crime of murder; (n) and it must also be stated, that the prisoner murdered the deceased. Where an inquisition, after correctly charging the principal in the first degree, alleged that the two other prisoners, at the time of the felony aforesaid '(to wit) on the day and year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, were feloniously present, then and there abetting, aiding, and assisting the said N.' &c., it was objected that the word 'feloniously' only applied to 'present,' and not to 'abetting, aiding, and assisting'; and it was held that the inquisition was bad on this ground. (q) And where an indictment for murder, after correctly charging the principal in the first degree, proceeded to allege that 'at the time of the felony and murder was committed (to wit)' &c., precisely in the same terms as in the preceding case, and, upon demurrer, it was objected that the indictment was bad, and that case was relied upon as in point; Coltman, J., said, that it was a grave authority in support of the objection, but he would reserve the point, as the case was so serious a one: it was further objected that the bad English made the averment insufficient, but Coltman, J., was inclined to think that the word 'was' might be rejected, he however would reserve this point also. Of the finding

Where the grand jury return the bill of indictment only a true bill for manslaughter, and ignoramus as to murder, it is stated to have been the usual course to strike out, in the presence of the grand jury, the words 'maliciously' and 'of malice aforethought,' and 'murder,' and to leave only so much as makes the bill to be one for manslaughter; (s) and this appears to be the practice at the present time upon some of the circuits: (t) but it has been thought to be the safer way to present a new bill to the grand jury for manslaughter. (u) And a very learned Judge has ordered this to be done where the grand jury have returned manslaughter upon a bill for murder, saying he thought it the better course to prefer a new bill, although the usual course on the circuit had been to alter the bill for murder, on the finding of the grand jury. (v) Though the same indictment may charge one with murder and another with manslaughter, yet if it charge both with murder, the grand jury cannot find it a true bill against one, and manslaughter as to the other; but a finding against one for murder will be good, and there ought to be a new bill against the other for manslaughter. (w) And where the grand jury returned a true bill for murder against one, and for manslaughter against another, the one was tried for murder on that indictment; but a new bill for manslaughter was preferred against the other. (x)

If, as is very commonly the case, there be an indictment for murder, and a coroner's inquisition for the same offence against the same person, at the same sessions of gaol delivery, the usual practice appears to be to arraign and try the prisoner upon both, in order to avoid the plea of autrefois acquit or attaint; and to indorse his acquittal or attainder upon both presentments. (y)

And where the coroner's jury have found a verdict of manslaughter, and the grand jury a bill for murder, the prisoner has been arraigned and tried on both the inquisition and indictment at the same time. (z) So where the grand jury have found a bill for manslaughter, and the coroner's jury a verdict of wilful murder. (a) So where the grand jury have found a bill against more prisoners for murder than the coroner's jury. (b)

Where a man has been acquitted generally upon an indictment for murder, autrefois acquit is a good plea to an indictment for the manslaughter of the same person; and à converso where a man has been acquitted on an indictment for manslaughter, he shall not be indicted for the same death as murder; the fact being the same, and the difference only in the degree. (c) And upon similar grounds it should seem, that one who had been convicted upon an indictment for manslaughter, and had his clergy allowed, might have pleaded autrefois convict to an indictment, charging the same death upon him as a murder. (d) And it is clear that autrefois convict of manslaughter, and clergy thereupon allowed, was a good bar in an appeal of murder. (e) And autrefois acquit, or autrefois attaint, upon an indictment for murder, was a good plea to an indictment charging the same death as petit treason. (f)

As a final determination in a Court having competent jurisdiction is conclusive in all Courts of concurrent jurisdiction, it has been held that a party who has killed another in a foreign country, and been there prosecuted, tried, and acquitted, may avail himself of such acquittal in answer to any charge against him in this country for the same offence. In a case where the prisoner had been tried for murder, and convicted of manslaughter, and had received the benefit of clergy, and was subsequently tried for murder, and convicted of manslaughter in killing another individual (who died after the first trial) by the same act which caused the death of the first; the Judges were unanimously of opinion, that the former allowance of clergy protected the prisoner against any punishment upon the second verdict; and that if the prisoner were to be called up for judgment, he might rely upon such allowance as a bar. (h)

Of the evidence.

The evidence, in cases of murder, will consist of the proof of the particular facts and circumstances which show the killing, and that it was committed by the party accused of malice aforethought. It should be observed, however, that when the fact of killing is proved, all the circumstances of accident, necessity, or infirmity, are to be satisfactorily shown by the prisoner, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him; for the law presumes the fact to have been founded in malice until the contrary appears. Rule as to its being shown that the body of the deceased has been found.

It has been considered a rule, that no person should be convicted of murder unless the body of the deceased has been found: and a very great judge says, 'I would never convict any person of murder or manslaughter, unless the fact were proved to be done, or at least the body be found dead.' (k) But this rule, it seems, must be taken with some qualifications; and circumstances may be sufficiently strong to show the fact of the murder, though the body has never been found. Thus, where the prisoner, a mariner, was indicted for the murder of his captain at sea, and a witness stated that the prisoner had proposed to kill the captain, and that the witness being afterwards alarmed in the night by a violent noise, went upon deck, and there observed the prisoner take the captain up and throw him overboard into the sea, and that he was not seen or heard of afterwards; and that near the place on the deck where the captain was seen, a billet of wood was found, and that the deck and part of the prisoner's dress were stained with blood; the Court, though they admitted the general rule of law, left it to the jury to say, upon the evidence, whether the deceased was not killed before his body was cast into the sea; and the jury being of that opinion, the prisoner was convicted, and (the convic-

But where upon an indictment against the prisoner for the murder of her bastard child, it appeared that she was seen, with the child in her arms, on the road from the place where she had been at service to the place where her father lived, about six in the evening, and between eight and nine she arrived at her father's, without the child, and the body of a child was found in a tide-river, near which she must have passed in her road to her father's, but the body could not be identified as that of the child of the prisoner, and the evidence rather tended to show that it was not the body of such child; it was held that she was entitled to be acquitted; the evidence rendered it probable that the child found was not the child of the prisoner; and with respect to the child, which was really her child, the prisoner could not by law be called upon either to account for it, or to say where it was, unless there were evidence to show that her child was actually dead. (m)

A prisoner cannot be called upon to account for her child, unless it be shown to be dead.

On a trial for murder, in order to prove the state of the health of the deceased prior to the day of his death, a witness was asked in what state of health the deceased seemed to be when he last saw him, and he began to state a conversation which had then taken place between the deceased and himself on this subject; and Alderson, B., held that what the deceased said to the witness was reasonable evidence to prove his state of health at the time. (n)

Upon an indictment for murder by the explosion of certain grenades, a novel kind of explosive instrument, evidence of other deaths and wounds caused by the explosion at the same time and place is admissible for the purpose of proving the character of the grenades. (o) Where in the same case a witness was called to prove that he made the grenades, it was held that the name of the person who gave the order for them might be proved, as a fact in the transaction, even though he had not then been shown to be connected with the prisoner. (p)

It has already been shown that if A. be indicted as having given the mortal stroke, and B. and C. as present aiding and assisting, and upon the evidence it appeared that B. gave the stroke, and A. and C. were aiding and assisting, or it be not proved which gave the stroke, the charge is proved, for in law it is the

It was urged on the prisoner's behalf at the trial by Garrow, (the late Mr. Baron Garrow,) that he was entitled to be acquitted, on the ground that it was not proved that the captain was dead; and that as there were many ships and vessels near the place where the transaction was alleged to have taken place, the probability was that he was taken up by some of them, and was then alive. And the learned counsel mentioned a remarkable case which had happened before Mr. J. Gould. The mother and reputed father of a bastard child were observed to take the child to the margin of the dock at Liverpool, and, after stripping it, cast it into the dock. The body of the infant was not afterwards seen; and, as the tide of the sea flowed and reflowed into and out of the dock, the learned Judge, upon the trial of the father and mother for the murder of their child, observed that it was possible the tide might have carried out the living infant; and upon this ground the jury, by his direction, acquitted the prisoners. stroke of all. (q) So if a prisoner be indicted for strangling the deceased with her own hands, and upon the evidence it turns out that the deceased was strangled by some one else in the presence of the prisoner, who was privy to it, and so near as to be able to assist, that is sufficient. (r)

An indictment for murder, stating that the prisoner gave and administered poison, is supported by proof that the prisoner gave the poison to A. to administer as a medicine to the deceased, and that A. neglecting to do so, it was accidentally given to the deceased by a child, the prisoner's intention to murder continuing. Upon an indictment for murder, which alleged that the prisoner feloniously, &c. did administer a large quantity of laudanum to a child, it appeared that the prisoner delivered to one S. Stephens, with whom the child was at nurse, about an ounce of laudanum, telling her that it was proper medicine for the child, and directing her to administer to the child every night a tea-spoonful thereof, which was quite a sufficient quantity to kill the child; the prisoner's intention in so doing, as shown by the finding of the jury, was to kill the child. Stephens took home the laudanum, and thinking the child did not require medicine, did not intend to administer it at all, and left it on the mantel-piece of her room. A few days afterwards a little boy of the said S. Stephens, during her accidental absence, removed the laudanum from its place and administered a much larger dose than a tea-spoonful to the child, in consequence of which the child died. The jury were directed that if the prisoner delivered the laudanum to Stephens, with intent that she should administer it to the child, and thereby produce its death, the quantity so directed to be administered being sufficient to cause death; and that, if the laudanum was afterwards administered by an unconscious agent, while the prisoner's original intention continued, the death of the child, under such circumstances, was murder by the prisoner, and that if the tea-spoonful was sufficient to produce death, the administration of a much larger quantity by the little boy would make no difference. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and, upon a case reserved for the opinion of the Judges, whether the facts above stated constituted an administering of the poison by the prisoner to the child, they were unanimously of opinion, that the administering of the poison by the child was, under the circumstances of the case, as much, in point of law, an administering by the prisoner, as if she had actually administered it with her own hand. agent.

Upon an indictment, alleging that the prisoner did an act which caused the death, it is sufficient to prove that the prisoner caused and procured the act to be done by an innocent agent. proved to have applied two plasters over the head of the deceased, but a third, which was applied last before the deceased died, was applied by the child's mother, in the absence of the prisoner, it being made with materials, which had been given by the prisoner to the mother for that purpose; it was objected that the indictment was not proved; but it was held that, though indictments often go on to say, that the prisoner 'caused and procured' the thing to be done, yet if the plaster was made by the direction of the prisoner, that was enough. (t)

There is one important species of evidence occasionally resorted to in cases of homicide, namely, the dying declarations of the party killed, which will be considered in a future part of this Treatise. (u)

Dying declarations.

The jury may, upon an indictment for murder, find the prisoner guilty of the offence charged, or of the lesser offences of manslaughter or excusable homicide; (v) or of an attempt to commit the murder by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9. Where, however, the facts of the case amount only to excusable homicide, it is usual for the Judge, at the present day, to permit or direct a general verdict of acquittal, unless some considerable blame appears to attach to the conduct of the party. (w) And several persons present at a homicide may be found guilty in different degrees, one of murder, the other only of manslaughter. (x)

Of the verdict.

We have seen that by the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 68, (y) any person may be tried for murder or manslaughter, which has been committed upon the sea, in any county or place in which he shall be apprehended or be in custody, and shall be subject to the same punishment as if he had committed such murder or manslaughter upon land.

Murder or manslaughter committed on the seas.

In every case where the point turns upon the question, whether the homicide was committed wilfully and maliciously, or under justifying, excusing, or alleviating circumstances, the matter of fact, namely, whether the facts alleged by way of justification, excuse, or alleviation, are true, is the proper and only province of the jury. But whether, upon a supposition of the truth of the facts, such homicide be justified, excused, or alleviated, must be submitted to the judgment of the Court; for the construction which the law puts upon facts stated and agreed, or found by a jury, is in this, as in all other cases, undoubtedly the proper province of the Court. (z) In cases of doubt and real difficulty it is commonly recommended to the jury to state facts and circumstances in a special verdict. But where the law is clear, the jury, under the direction of the Court in point of law, matters of fact being still left to their determination, may, and if they are well advised, always will, find a general verdict, conformably to such direction. (a) And if the jury bring in a verdict of manslaughter in a case which clearly amounts to murder, the Court should not receive the verdict. (b)

The jury should attend to the directions of the Court.

Concealing the birth of children.

The 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, which repealed the 21 Jac. 1, c. 27, and the Irish Act 6 Anne, provided that the trials, in England and Ireland, of women charged with the murder of any issue of their bodies, which would by law be bastard, should proceed by the like rules of evidence and presumption as were allowed to take place in respect to other trials for murder; and that the jury, by whose verdict any prisoner charged with such murder as aforesaid should be acquitted, might find, 'that the prisoner was delivered of issue of her body, male or female, which, if born alive, would have been bastard; and that she did, by secret burying, or otherwise, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof.'

Where women endeavour to conceal the birth of their children, they are punishable either by indictment for that offence, or the jury may find them guilty of it upon an indictment for murder.

Concealing the birth of a child.

This provision, as it could only be acted upon where the child was a bastard and where the party was charged with murder by an inquisition or an indictment, (c) was open to much objection, and has been repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; and that Act by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, 'If any woman shall be delivered of a child, every person who shall, by any secret disposition of the dead body of the said child, whether such child died before, at, or after its birth, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour: Provided that if any person tried for the murder of any child shall be acquitted thereof, it shall be lawful for the jury, by whose verdict such person shall be acquitted, to find, in case it shall so appear in evidence, that the child had recently been born, and that such person did, by some secret disposition of the dead body of such child, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, and thereupon the Court may pass such sentence as if such person had been convicted upon an indictment for the concealment of the birth.' (d)

Cases had not unfrequently occurred where endeavours had been made to conceal the birth of children, and there was no evidence to prove that the mother participated in those endeavours, though there was sufficient evidence that others did so, and under the former enactments, under such circumstances, all must have been acquitted. (e) The present clause is so framed as to include every person who uses any such endeavour, and it is quite immaterial under it whether there be any evidence against the mother or not.

Under the former enactments a person assisting the mother in

(c) This statute did not make the concealment an offence for which an indictment could be preferred. Rex v. Parkinson, Carlisle Sum. Ass. 1821. MS. Bayley, J. The 49 Geo. 3, c. 14, which repeals the Scotch Act of Parliament, relating to the murder of bastard children, differs from the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, and does not make the concealment a matter which can only be found by the jury upon the trial of an indictment for murder, but enacts (sec. 2) 'that if any woman in Scotland shall conceal her being with child during the whole period of her pregnancy, and shall not call for and make use of help or assistance in the birth, and if the child be found dead or be missing, the mother, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two years, in such common gaol or prison as the Court before which she is tried shall direct and appoint.'

(d) This clause is framed from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 14; and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 17 (1).

(e) Reg. v. Waterage, 1 Cox C. C. 338. Reg. v. Skelton, 3 C. & K. 119.

concealing a birth would only have been indictable as an aider or abettor; but a person so assisting would come within the terms of this clause as a principal.

Under the former enactments the mother alone could be convicted of this offence where she was tried for the murder of her child. Under this clause any person tried for the murder of a child may be convicted of this offence, whether the mother be convicted or not. (ee)

By the repealed statute of 21 Jac. 1, the concealment of the death of the bastard child by the mother made her guilty of a capital offence, unless she could prove that the child was born dead; and upon this statute it was decided, that if the mother called for help, or confessed herself with child, she was not within its construction; and, upon the same principle, evidence was always allowed of the mother's having made provision for the birth, as a circumstance to show that she did not intend to conceal it. (f) So upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, it seems that if the woman had made her pregnancy known to persons not implicated with her in the concealment, it would have been an answer to the charge of concealment. Thus where the prisoner threw a bastard child of which she had been delivered into the privy; and it was probable upon the evidence that the child was still-born: Bayley, J., held that this was no answer to the charge of concealment; but he said that if the prisoner had communicated her pregnancy, or, to the knowledge of any other persons, made preparations for her confinement, the case would not have been within the statute. (g) So since the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, where the body of a child was found among the feathers of a bed, but it did not appear by whom it had been placed there, and the prisoner had prepared clothes for the child, and sent for a surgeon at the time of her confinement, an acquittal was directed. (h)

Upon the 21 Jac. 1, the presence even of an accomplice was holden to take a case out of the Act; so that where a woman was indicted for the murder of her bastard child, and the mother of the woman was indicted at the same time for being present aiding and abetting, and there was no other evidence of guilt but the concealment by both the prisoners, they were acquitted. (i) And if from the view of the child it were testified by one witness, by apparent probabilities, that it had not arrived at its debitum partus tempus, as if it wanted hair or nails, the case was considered as not being within that statute, on account of there being presumptive evidence that the child was born dead; but under such circumstances it was left to the jury upon the evidence, as at common law, to say whether the mother was guilty of the death. (h) But the construction upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, had been different. A woman might be found guilty of concealment, although from appearances it was probable the child was still-born, and although though the child was still-born, and the birth known to an accomplice.

Sending for a person at the beginning of the labour, and the pregnancy being known to other persons, is only evidence for the consideration of the jury, not a bar to the prosecution. Disposal of the body by an agent.

the birth was probably known to an accomplice. The prisoner and one Diana Thompson were indicted for the murder of the prisoner's bastard child; it was a seven months' child, and from the state in which it was found the probability was that it was still-born. D. Thompson, when questioned immediately after the child's birth, wholly denied it, though she must have known it. The prisoner threw the child down the privy; and the jury found this an endeavour to conceal the birth; and on a case reserved the Judges were unanimous that this was evidence of an endeavour to conceal the birth. (l)

The sending for a female to attend at the beginning of the labour, and the fact of its being known to the mother of the woman and others that she is pregnant, are no bar to a conviction for concealing the birth, but only evidence for the consideration of the jury. If the dead body of the child be buried, or otherwise disposed of by an accomplice of the mother in her absence, the accomplice acting as her agent in so doing, she may be convicted of endeavouring to conceal the birth. Upon an indictment for the murder of a child, it appeared that the male and female prisoners had been living together for some time, and that she was delivered of the child about four in the morning, in the presence of the man, who was the father of it, and that the man very soon afterwards put the child (which had not been separated from the after-birth) into a pan, carried it down stairs into the cellar, and threw the whole into the privy, the female remaining in bed upstairs; she had said she knew it was to be done: the fact of her being with child was some time before her delivery known by her mother, who lived at some distance, and it was apparent to other women: no female was present at the delivery; one had been sent for at the commencement of the labour, about twelve at night, but was so ill she could not attend: there were no clothes prepared, or other provision made, but the parties were in a state of the most abject poverty. The prisoners' counsel contended, upon the authority of Peat's case, (m) and Rex v. Hghey, (n) that she could not be convicted of concealment: but it being doubted whether those cases would now be considered law, a case was reserved upon the questions, 1st, whether there was evidence to convict her as a principal; and 2nd, whether, in point of law, the conviction was good, and the Judges were of opinion that the communication made to other persons was only evidence, but no bar; and that the conviction was good. (o) Upon an indictment against a woman for endeavouring to conceal the birth of her child, and against a man for aiding her in so doing, it appeared that the woman was delivered of a child, which did not live more than a few minutes: the man, who cohabited with her, took the body almost immediately and buried it in a field, she not leaving her bed. The woman had denied her pregnancy, and after the birth had denied that she had had a child. Platt, B., 'If the woman concurred with the man in endeavouring to conceal the birth of the child, and, in pursuit of that object, caused him, by her persuasion, to bury the body secretly, she is guilty of the endeavour by secret burying charged in this indictment, although the burial was effected by the hand of another, and not in her presence; and that being so, if the man, acting under such persuasion, and intending to conceal the birth of the child, buried the body of the child, he is guilty of aiding and abetting in the commission of the offence.' (p)

In order to bring a case within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 14, the disposal of the body of the child must have been complete. The prisoner was found going across a yard in the direction towards a privy with a bundle of cloth sewed up, with the body of a child in it, and was stopped; Gurney, B., interposed, and said, that the prisoner could not be convicted, the offence not being complete; 'the body must be buried or otherwise disposed of, to bring the case within the Act. Here she was interrupted in the act, probably, of disposing of the body, but the act was incomplete.' (q) So where the dead body of a child was found, on the day of its birth, shut up in a trunk in the same room where the prisoner had been delivered, and which she had not quitted after the delivery, and there was some evidence to show that it was placed there for the purpose of concealment, it was contended that the prisoner could not have intended to let the body remain in the box, but must have meant, if she wished to conceal the birth, to remove it to some other place, and that, if that was the case, she was not guilty of an offence within this clause, and the preceding case was referred to; and Gurney, B. directed the jury to acquit, if they thought the prisoner had not put the body in the trunk, as in a place of ultimate disposal; (r) and the same doctrine was followed in several subsequent cases. (s) But these cases were afterwards overruled, (t) and it was held that any concealment of the body, whether intended to be final or temporary, was within the Act. (u)

In order to avoid all such questions in future, the words 'any secret disposition of the dead body' were substituted for the words of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 14, 'secret burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body;' and consequently the only question upon these words is, whether there was any secret disposition whatever of the dead body, and it is perfectly immaterial whether that disposition be temporary or permanent.

Words of the new Act.

In order to bring a case within the clause, some act of disposal of the body must be done after the death of the child. Where on an indictment for endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child, it appeared that the prisoner was delivered in a privy; that the child dropped from her there into the soil, and that there she left it, and the jury thought that she went to the privy for the purpose of being delivered there, and for the purpose thereby of concealing the birth; upon a case reserved, the Judges thought, upon the wording of the Act, it was necessary something should be done by the prisoner after the birth to bring the case within the Act. (v) So in a similar case, where the prisoner had denied her pregnancy and the birth, and the body of the child was found in a privy; Patteson, J., told the jury that the offence was not merely the endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child, but the prisoner, to come within the meaning of the Act, must have endeavoured to conceal the birth by secret burying, or otherwise disposing of the dead body of the child; and it was essential to the commission of this offence that she should have done some act of disposal of the body after the child was dead. If she had gone to the privy for another purpose, and the child came from her unawares, and fell into the soil and was suffocated, she must be acquitted, notwithstanding her denial of the birth of the child, because she did not come within the provisions of the Act, unless she had done something with the child after it was dead. If there had been evidence that the child was born elsewhere, and was, after it was dead, carried by her to this place, and thrown in, that would be a disposing of the body within the Act. (w) It is a question for the jury in such a case whether the prisoner threw the dead body into the privy, or whether it fell from her into it. (x)

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the child was discovered in an outhouse, alive but concealed from view by four bundles of rick-pegs lying horizontally in front and partly over it, but not touching it: the child was left as it was found, and about an hour afterwards the rick-pegs were found to have been partially removed, and placed on one side of the child, which was dead, and there was evidence to show that the prisoner alone had been in the outhouse during the hour. For the prosecution it was urged that if the prisoner after the death of the child re-covered it, that would be a secret disposal of the body. Lord Campbell, C.J., 'I have carefully examined the statute, and the facts with reference to the point suggested by the counsel for the prosecution. Any objection that might have arisen, that there was no attempt to conceal the dead body of the child, is, I think, removed in the manner suggested: for there cannot be any reasonable doubt that the prisoner visited the outhouse after the child was dead, and although she did not remove it, any replacing of the clothes or other things by which the body was concealed from view, would, I think, be an endeavour to conceal by a secret disposal of the dead body within the statute.' below; the head of the child separated from the body, and a knife lying near it, and the body was in the middle of the room, Talbourn, J., held that there was no evidence of an endeavour to conceal. (z)

Where, on an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner had denied that she was in the family way; but in consequence of a stain of blood having been discovered in her bedroom she was questioned, and then said that she had taken the child away, and put it in a sheet of water in a park, and she accompanied the constable thither, and pointed out where she had thrown in the body, and it was found wrapped in a towel and dressed in a cap and shirt; and she afterwards stated that she had put away the body in a box in her room for two days, after which she threw it into the water, and said she should have had it buried in the churchyard, only she was afraid of provoking her father: Colman, J., told the jury that the offence contemplated by the Act was the endeavour to conceal the birth from the world at large, and not from any individual. The statute did not apply to individuals, but to society in general. If, therefore, the secret disposal of the dead body arose from an endeavour to conceal the birth from some private individual, and not from the world at large, then the offence contemplated by the statute had not been committed; and if the jury believed that the prisoner was really actuated by the dread of provoking her father's displeasure, she was not guilty of this offence. (a)

The endeavour must be to conceal from the public; not merely from an individual.

Where, on an indictment for concealing the birth, a surgeon stated that the remains were those of a child of which the mother must have gone from seven to nine months; Erle, J., told the jury that 'this offence cannot be committed unless the child had arrived at that stage of maturity at the time of birth that it might have been a living child. It is not necessary that it should have been born alive, but it must have reached a period when, but for some accidental circumstances, such as disease on the part of itself, or of its mother, it might have been born alive. There is no law which compels a woman to proclaim her own want of chastity; and if she had miscarried at a time when the fœtus was but a few months old, and therefore could have had no chance of life, you could not convict her upon this charge. No specific limit can be assigned to the period when the chance of life begins; but it may, perhaps, be safely assumed that, under seven months, the great probability is that the child would not be born alive.' (b)

As to how far the child must have progressed towards its birth.

An indictment for concealing the birth of a child must expressly allege the child to be dead, for it is only an offence to conceal the dead body. (c)

Indictment.

An indictment stated that the prisoner endeavoured to conceal the birth of her child 'by secretly disposing of the dead body;' and it was objected that the mode of disposal ought to be stated to enable the Court to see whether it amounted to the complete disposition contemplated by the statute; one mode was specified in the Act, and any other ought to be stated; and Maule, J.,

The mode of disposal must have been stated under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31.

expressing a strong opinion that the objection was good, the counsel for the prosecution declined to press the case. (d)

An indictment alleging that the prisoner did cast the dead body of her child into the waters and filth in a privy, and 'did thereby then and there unlawfully dispose of the dead body of the said child, and endeavour to conceal the birth thereof,' is sufficient; for the word 'thereby' applies both to the disposal and to the endeavour; and the indictment need not allege that the child died before, at, or after its birth. (e)

A bad indictment for murder will not support a conviction.

Where an indictment for murder was held bad, because it neither named the child nor stated that its name was unknown, it was held that the prisoner could not be convicted of endeavouring to conceal the birth of the child: for the indictment being bad for its professed purpose was bad altogether. (f)

Whether the prisoner were charged with the murder of her bastard child by the coroner's inquisition, or by a bill of indictment returned by the grand jury, she might have been found guilty, under the 43 Geo. 3. of endeavouring to conceal the birth, for the coroner's inquisition is a charge. (g)

Of Judgment and Execution.

[575]

THE judgment and mode of execution in cases of murder, is now regulated by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100.

Murder.

Sec. 1. 'Whosoever shall be convicted of murder shall suffer death as a felon.' (h)

Sentence for murder.

Sec. 2. 'Upon every conviction for murder the Court shall pronounce sentence of death, and the same may be carried into execution, and all other proceedings upon such sentence and in respect thereof may be had and taken, in the same manner in all respects as sentence of death might have been pronounced and carried into execution, and all other proceedings thereupon and in respect thereof might have been had and taken, before the passing of this Act, upon a conviction for any other felony for which the prisoner might have been sentenced to suffer death as a felon.'

By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 48, s. 1, where any prisoner was convicted of any capital felony, except murder, the Court, instead of pronouncing sentence of death, was empowered to order that sentence to be recorded. By the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 30, s. 2, which applied both to England and Ireland, it was enacted, that 'sentence of death may be pronounced after convictions for murder in the same manner, and the Judge shall have the same power in all respects as after convictions for other capital offences.' In Reg. v. Hogg, (hh) Lord Denman, C. J., held, that under this clause sentence of death might be recorded on a conviction for murder. By the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 77, s. 3, whenever any offender is convicted before the Central Criminal Court of any crime punishable with death, that Court may direct judgment of death to be recorded. This clause clearly included murder. This clause, so far as it relates to murder, and the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 30, s. 2, are repealed by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, and the present clause renders it imperative upon the Court to pass sentence of death on every person convicted of murder; it leaves, however, the time of passing the sentence, and all other proceedings, exactly as they were before this Act passed. (i)

(d) Reg. v. Hounsell, 2 M. & Rob. 292. But as the present clause has the words 'any secret disposition,' it should seem that an indictment in this form would be good; for every secret disposition is included. See Holloway v. Reg. 17 Q. B. 317, ante, p. 605, where it was held that a count for aiding an escape was good, though it did not state the means used, because the words of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 43, are 'shall, by any means whatever, aid.'

Sec. 3. 'The body of every person executed for murder shall be buried within the precincts of the prison in which he shall have been last confined after conviction, and the sentence of the Court shall so direct.' (h)

Body to be buried in prison.

Where two persons had been convicted of a barbarous murder in Pembrokeshire, at the Hereford assizes, being the next English county, and the indictment had been removed by certiorari into the Court of King's Bench, in order to argue some exceptions, which were overruled, that Court decided, after some question made whether the prisoners ought not to be sent back to Herefordshire to receive sentence, that they had the same jurisdiction over facts committed in Wales, as if committed in the next adjacent county in England; and the prisoners were therefore sentenced in the King's Bench, and were executed by the marshal. (l) But it seems to have been considered in a late case, that sentence pursuant to the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 37, may be passed by a judge at nisi prius upon an indictment for murder removed by certiorari into the Court of King's Bench, and afterwards tried at nisi prius, without remitting the transcript of the record to the Court of Queen's Bench. (m)

Sentence after removal of the indictment to the King's Bench by certiorari.

On the application of the attorney-general, the Court of King's Bench will, as a matter of course, grant a habeas corpus to bring up prisoners convicted of murder and sentenced to death at the assizes, and a certiorari to remove into the King's Bench the record of the conviction and judgment. The prisoners were convicted of murder at Chester, and sentenced to be executed the next Friday; but a question arose, whether, since the 11 Geo. 4, & 1 Will. 4, c. 70, ss. 13, 14, and 15, the sheriffs of the city or the sheriff of the county were bound to execute the sentence; and both parties refusing to do it, the prisoners had been from time to time respited. The attorney-general moved for a certiorari to remove the record of the conviction and the judgment, and for a habeas corpus to bring up the prisoners, in order that execution might be awarded by the King's Bench, and said he considered himself entitled to the writs as of right: but from respect to the Court, and for his own justification in the course he adopted, he stated the grounds of his application, and cited many cases to show that he was entitled to the writs as of course, and that the Court of King's Bench might direct execution to be done by the sheriff of the county of Chester, or those of the city, by the sheriff of Middlesex, or by the marshal of the King's Bench; and the writs were forthwith granted by the Court. (n)

When the prisoners were brought up and called upon to state if they had anything to say why execution should not be awarded, one of them prayed three days' time to answer; and the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, granted the application as to both. (o) When the prisoners were brought up again, one of them pleaded ore tenus. (p) that the King by proclamation in the 'Gazette' had promised pardon to any person, except the actual murderer, who should give information, whereby such murderer should be apprehended and convicted; and that he, not being the actual murderer, had given such information, and thereby entitled himself to the pardon. The attorney-general demurred to the plea ore tenus, and the Court held that it was bad. CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF MANSLAUGHTER.

IN this species of homicide, malice, which has been shown (a) to be the main ingredient and characteristic of murder, is considered to be wanting; and though manslaughter is in its degree felonious, yet it is imputed by the benignity of the law to human infirmity; to infirmity which, though in the eye of the law criminal, is considered as incident to the frailty of the human constitution. (b)

In order to make an abettor to a manslaughter a principal in the felony, he must be present aiding and abetting the fact committed. (c) It was formerly considered that there could not be any accessories before the fact in any case of manslaughter, because it was presumed to be altogether sudden, and without premeditation. (d) And it was laid down, that if the indictment be for murder against A., and that B. and C. were counselling and abetting as accessories before only (and not as present aiding and abetting, for such are principals), if A. be found guilty only of manslaughter, and acquitted of murder, the accessories before will be thereby discharged. (e) But the position ought to be limited to those cases where the killing is sudden and unpremeditated; for there are cases of manslaughter where there may be accessories. (f) Thus a man may be such an accessory by purchasing poison for a pregnant woman to take in order to procure abortion, and which she takes and thereby causes her death. (g) There may, however, be accessories after the fact in manslaughter. (h) If, therefore, upon an indictment against the principal and an accessory after the fact for murder, the offence of the principal be reduced to manslaughter, the accessory may be convicted as accessory to the manslaughter. SEC. I.

WHENEVER death ensues from the sudden transport of passion, or heat of blood upon a reasonable provocation, and without malice, it is considered as solely imputable to human infirmity; and the offence will be manslaughter. (k) It should be remembered that the person sheltering himself under this plea of provocation must make out the circumstances of alleviation to the satisfaction of the Court and Jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him; as the presumption of law deems all homicide to be malicious, until the contrary is proved. (l)

vocation.

It has been shown that the most grievous words of reproach, contemptuous and insulting actions or gestures, or trespasses against lands or goods, will not free the party killing from the guilt of murder, if upon such provocation a deadly weapon was made use of, or an intention to kill, or to do some great bodily harm, was otherwise manifested. (m) But if no such weapon be used, or intention manifested, and the party so provoked give the other a box on the ear or strike him with a stick or other weapon not likely to kill, and kill him unluckily and against his intention, it will be only manslaughter. (n)

It is, indeed, said to have been held in one case that words of menace of bodily harm are a sufficient provocation to reduce the offence of killing to manslaughter; (o) but it has been considered that such words ought, at least, to be accompanied by some act denoting an immediate intention of following them up by an actual assault. (p)

But, though words of slighting, disdain, or contumely, will not of themselves make such a provocation as to lessen the crime into manslaughter; yet, it seems that if A. give indecent language to B., and B. thereupon strike A., but not mortally, and then A. strike B. again, and then B. kill A., that this is but manslaughter. The stroke by A. was deemed a new provocation, and the conflict a sudden falling out; and on those grounds the killing was considered as only manslaughter. (q)

(q) 1 Hale, 455, where it is said, that this was held to be manslaughter, according to the proverb, 'the second blow

Where an assault is made with violence or circumstances of indignity upon a man's person, as by pulling him by the nose, and the party so assaulted kills the aggressor, the crime will be reduced to manslaughter, in case it appears that the assault was resented immediately, and the aggressor killed in the heat of blood, the furor brevis occasioned by the provocation. (r) So if A. be passing along the street, and B. meeting him (there being convenient distance between A. and the wall) take the wall of him and jostle him, and thereupon A. kill B., it is said that such jostling would amount to a provocation which would make the killing only manslaughter. And again it appears to have been considered that where A. riding on the road, B. whipped the horse of A. out of the track, and then A. alighted and killed B., it was only manslaughter. (s)

Provocation
by assault.

But, in the two last cases, it should seem that the first aggression must have been accompanied with circumstances of great violence or insolence; for it is not every trivial provocation which, in point of law, amounts to an assault, that will of course reduce the crime of the party killing to manslaughter. Even a blow will not be considered as sufficient provocation to extenuate in cases where the revenge is disproportioned to the injury, and outrageous and barbarous in its nature: but, where the blow which gave the provocation has been so violent as reasonably to have caused a sudden transport of passion and heat of blood, the killing which ensued has been regarded as the consequence of human infirmity, and entitled to lenient consideration. Thus, where a woman, after some words of abuse on both sides, gave a soldier a box on the ear, which the soldier returned, by striking her on her breast with the pommel of his sword; and the woman then running away, the soldier pursued, and stabbed her in the back with his sword; Holt, C. J., at first considered it to be murder: but upon its coming out in the progress of the trial, that the woman had struck the soldier with a patten on the face with great force, so that the blood flowed, it was holden clearly to be no more than manslaughter. (t) In this case, the smart of the soldier's wound, and the effusion of blood, might possibly have kept his indignation boiling to the moment of the fact. (u)

Slight provocation, even by a blow, will not extenuate, if the revenge be barbarous.

Where a man has been injuriously and without proper authority restrained of his liberty, the provocation has been considered sufficient to extenuate: as where a creditor placed a man at the chamber-door of his debtor, with a sword undrawn, to prevent him from escaping, while a bailiff was sent for to arrest him; and the debtor stabbed the creditor who was discoursing with him in the chamber. (v) And the same doctrine was held in a case where a serjeant in the army laid hold of a fifer, and insisted upon carrying him to prison: the fifer resisted; and whilst the serjeant had hold of him to force him, he drew the serjeant's sword, plunged it into his body, and killed him. The serjeant had no right to make the arrest, except under the articles of war; and the articles of war makes the affray; and Lord Hale says that this was the opinion of himself and some others.

were not given in evidence. Buller, J., considered it in two lights: first, if the serjeant had authority; and, secondly, if he had not, on account of the coolness, deliberation, and reflection, with which the stab was given. The jury found the prisoner guilty: but the Judges were unanimous, that the articles of war should have been produced; and, for want thereof, held the conviction wrong. (w)

Provocation
by detecting adulterer.

Where a man finds another in the act of adultery with his wife, and kills him or her (x) in the first transport of passion, he is only guilty of manslaughter, and that in the lowest degree: (y) for the provocation is grievous, such as the law reasonably concludes cannot be borne in the first transport of passion. But it has been already shown, that the killing of an adulterer deliberately, and upon revenge, would be murder. (z) So it seems that if a father were to see a person in the act of committing an unnatural offence with his son, and were instantly to kill him, it would only be manslaughter; but if he only hear of it from others, and go in search of the person afterwards, and kill him, when there had been time for the blood to cool, it would be murder (a)

Kelly's case.
Killing from

Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner, a soldier, was cohabiting with the deceased, and that he watched her go to the canteen of the barracks, and there drink with another soldier, upon which the prisoner went to his room in the barracks, and having got a cartridge from a pouch, and loaded his musket, he went to the barrack-yard and there meeting the deceased, he shot her, and she instantly died. In summing up, Rolfe, B., said, 'Primâ facie, when any man takes away the life of another, the law presumes that he did it of malice aforethought, unless there be evidence to show the contrary. Such are the cases where there has been a quarrel, a fight, or dispute, and in the violence of such quarrel, fight, or dispute, death has ensued. Undoubtedly we find other cases stated, and among them the case of adultery. It is said, that if a man were to find his wife in the act of committing adultery and kill her, that would be only manslaughter, because he would be supposed to be acting under an impulse so violent that he could not resist it. But I state it to you without the least fear or doubt, that to take away the life of a woman, even your own wife, because you suspect that she has been engaged in some illicit intrigue, would be murder; however strongly you may suspect it, it would most unquestionably be murder; and if I were to direct you, or you were to find otherwise, I am bound to tell you, either you I or would be grievously swerving from our duty.' It was not clear in the evidence in this case whether the prisoner loaded the musket immediately after he took the cartridge from his pouch, or whether he left the room and returned to it after taking the cartridge and before loading the musket; but Rolfe, B. observed that he thought it very immaterial as to the length of time that elapsed between the time when the prisoner saw the deceased and the soldier together and the time when he fired the

There are instances, where slight provocations have been considered as extenuating the guilt of homicide, upon the ground, that the conduct of the party killing upon such provocations might fairly be attributed to an intention to chastise, rather than to a cruel and implacable malice. But, in cases of this kind, it must appear, that the punishment was not urged with brutal violence, nor greatly disproportionate to the offence; and the instrument must not be such as, from its nature, was likely to endanger life. (c) Thus, where A. finding a trespasser on his land, in the first transport of his passion beat him, and unluckily happened to kill him, it was holden to be manslaughter: but it must be understood that he beat him, not with a mischievous intention, but merely to chastise for the trespass, and to deter him from committing it again. (d) And of the case of the keeper of a park, who finding a boy stealing wood in his master's ground, tied him to a horse's tail, and beat him, upon which the horse running away, the boy was killed, (e) it is said, that if the chastisement had been more moderate, it had been but manslaughter; for, between persons nearly connected together by civil and natural ties, the law admits the force of a provocation done to one to be felt by the other. (f) And à fortiori, if the master had himself caught the trespasser, and beat him in such a manner as showed a desire only to chastise and prevent a repetition of the offence, but had unfortunately, and against his intent, killed him, it would only have been manslaughter. (g)

Provocations of a slight kind, which have been allowed to extenuate, where the party killing has not acted with cruelty, or used dangerous instruments.

Where a person, whose pocket had been picked, encouraged by a concourse of people, threw the pickpocket into an adjoining pond, in order to avenge the theft by ducking him, but without any apparent intention to take away his life, and the pickpocket was drowned, it was ruled to be only manslaughter; for, though this mode of punishment is highly unjustifiable and illegal, yet the law respects the infirmities and imbecilities of human nature, where certain provocations are given. (h)

Ducking a pickpocket.

In a case where the prisoner's son, having fought with another boy and been beaten, ran home to his father all bloody, and the father presently took a cudgel, ran three quarters of a mile, and struck the other boy upon the head, upon which he died; it was ruled to be manslaughter, because done in sudden heat and passion: (i) but the true grounds of the judgment seem to have been that the accident happened by a single stroke given in heat of blood, with a cudgel, not likely to destroy, and that death did not immediately ensue. (k)

Father taking up the quarrel of his son.

Several other cases are reported, in which the nature of the instrument used led to a lenient consideration of the homicide, on the ground that such instrument was not likely to endanger life.

shot; and equally little material whether the prisoner took the cartridge out of the pouch at the same time when he loaded the musket, or left the room between the one and the other, as, in point of law, there was nothing here to reduce the crime to manslaughter.

Thus, where a man, who was sitting drinking in an alehouse, being called by a woman 'a son of a whore,' took up a broomstaff, and threw it at her from a distance, and killed her; the Judges were not unanimous, and a pardon was advised; and the doubt appears to have arisen upon the ground, that the instrument was not such as could probably, at the given distance, have occasioned death, or great bodily harm. (l) A similar doubt appears to have been entertained in the following case, which was stated in a special verdict. A mother-in-law employed her daughter-in-law, a child of ten years old, to reel some yarn, and finding some of the skeins knotted, threw a four-legged stool at the child, which struck her on the right side of the head, on the temple, and caused her death soon afterwards; the verdict stated, that the stool was of sufficient size and weight to give a mortal blow; but that the mother-in-law did not intend, at the time she threw the stool, to kill the child. (m) And in a case where the prisoner had struck his boy with one of his clogs, because he had not cleaned them, it was held to be only manslaughter, because the master could not, from the size of the instrument he had made use of, have had any intention to take away the boy's life. (n)

In a case where the prisoner, who was a butcher, had employed a boy to tend some sheep, which were penned, who negligently suffered some of the sheep to escape through the hurdles, upon which the prisoner, seeing the sheep get through, ran towards the boy, and taking up a stake that was lying on the ground, threw it at him, and with it hit the boy on the head, and fractured his skull, of which fracture he soon afterwards died; Nares, J., told the jury to consider whether the stake, which, lying on the ground, was the first thing the prisoner saw in the heat of his passion, was, or was not, under the circumstances, and in the particular situation, an improper instrument for the purpose of correcting the negligence of the boy; and that, if they thought the stake was an improper instrument, they should further consider, whether it was probable that it was used with an intent to kill; if they thought it was, that they must find the prisoner guilty of murder; but, on the contrary, if they were persuaded that it was not done with an intent to kill, that the crime would then amount, at most, to manslaughter. The jury found it manslaughter. (o) So on an indictment for wounding with a tin can, with which the prisoner had struck the prosecutor four times on the head, Alderson, B., directed the jury to consider, 'whether the instrument employed was, in its ordinary use, likely to cause death; or, though an instrument unlikely, under ordinary circumstances, to cause death; whether it was used in such an extraordinary manner as to make it likely to cause death, either by continued blows or otherwise?

(o) Wiggs' case, reported in a note to Hazel's case, 1 Leach, 378. If, however, the instrument used is so improper, as manifestly to endanger life, it seems that the intention of the party to kill will be implied from that circumstance. Ante, p. 716.

A tin can, in its ordinary use, was not likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm; but if the prisoner struck the prosecutor repeated blows on the head with it, you will say, whether he did this merely to hurt the prosecutor, and give him pain, as by giving him a black eye or bloody nose, or whether he did it to do him some substantial grievous bodily harm. When a deadly weapon, such as a knife, a sword, or gun, is used, the intent of the party is manifest; but where an instrument like the present is used, you must consider, whether the mode in which it was used satisfactorily shows that the prisoner intended to inflict some serious or grievous bodily harm with it.' (p)

Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that a body of persons were committing a riot, and the constables interfering for the purpose of dispersing the crowd, and apprehending the offenders, resistance was made to them by the mob, and one of the constables was beaten severely by the mob; the different prisoners all took part in the violence used; some by beating him with sticks, some by throwing stones, and others by striking him with their fists; of this aggregate violence, the constable afterwards died. Alderson, B., 'The principles on which this case will turn, are these:—if a person attacks another without justifiable cause, and from the violence used death ensues, the question which arises is, whether it be murder or manslaughter? If the weapon used were a deadly weapon, it is reasonable to infer that the party intended death; and if he intended death, and death was the consequence of his act, it is murder. If no weapon was used, then the question usually is, was there excessive violence? If the evidence as to this be such as that the jury think there was an intention to kill, it is murder; if not, manslaughter. Thus, if there were merely a blow with a fist, and death ensued, it would not be reasonable to infer that there was an intention to kill; in that case, therefore, it is manslaughter. But if a strong man attacks a weak one, though no weapon be used, or if, after much injury by beating, the violence is still continued, then the question is whether this excess does not show a general brutality, and a purpose to kill, and if so, it is murder. Again, if the weapon used be not deadly, e.g. a stick, then the same question as above will arise as to the purpose to kill; and in any case if the nature of the violence, and the continuance of it be such, as that a rational man would conclude that death must follow from the acts done, then it is reasonable for a jury to infer that the party who did them intended to kill, and to find him guilty of murder. Again, it is a principle of law, that if several persons act together in pursuance of a common intent, every act done in furtherance of such intent by each of them is, in law, done by all. The act, however, must be in pursuance of the common intent. Thus, if several were to intend and agree together to frighten a constable, and one were to shoot him through the head, such an act would affect the individual only by whom it was done. Here, therefore, in considering this case, you must determine, whether all these prisoners had the common intent of attacking the constables; if so, each of them is responsible for all the acts of all the others done Macklin's case. If the nature of the violence be such that a rational man would conclude death would follow, it is reasonable for the jury to conclude death was intended.

for that purpose; and if all the acts done by each, if done by one man, would together show such violence, and so long continued, that from them you would infer an intention to kill the constable, it will be murder in them all. If you would not infer such purpose, you ought to find them guilty only of manslaughter. (q)

It has been before shown, that the plea of provocation will not avail in any case, where it appears that the provocation was sought for and induced by the act of the party in order to afford him a pretence for wreaking his malice; (r) and that even where there may have been previous struggling or blows, such plea cannot be admitted, where there is evidence of express malice. (s) It has also been observed, that in every case of homicide upon provocation, how great soever that provocation may have been, if there were sufficient time for passion to subside, and reason to interpose, such homicide will be murder; (t) and it should always be remembered, that where a party relies upon the plea of provocation, it must appear, that when he did the fact, he acted upon such provocation, and not upon any old grudge. (u)

SEC. II.

Cases of Mutual Combat.

Manslaughter
in mutual combat.

INSTANCES of mutual combat, in which, from the deliberate conduct of the parties, from some undue advantage taken by the party killing, or from the violent conduct which the party killing pursued in the first instance, the conclusion of malice has been drawn, and the killing has consequently amounted to murder, have been shown in the preceding chapter. (v) We have now to consider those cases where, upon words of reproach, or any other sudden provocation, the parties come to blows, and a combat ensues, no undue advantage being sought or taken on either side: for if death happen under such circumstances, the offence of the party killing will amount only to manslaughter. (w)

If, therefore, upon a sudden quarrel, the parties fight upon the spot, or if they presently fetch their weapons, and go into a field and fight, and one of them be killed, it will be but manslaughter, because it may be presumed that the blood never cooled. (x) And it must be observed, with regard to sudden rencounters, that when they are begun, the blood, previously too much heated, kindles afresh at every pass or blow; and in the tumult of the passions, in which mere instinct, self-preservation, has no inconsiderable share, the voice of reason is not heard: therefore the law, in condescension to the infirmities of flesh and blood, has extenuated the offence. the other, it is only manslaughter. Sir Charles Pym with one party, and Mr. Walters with another party, dined at a tavern; and on coming out Sir Charles P. and Mr. W. quarrelled and drew their swords, and Mr. W. ran Sir Charles P. through the body, and he died. There was no evidence of any unfair advantage taken by Mr. W.; nor could the witnesses say more than that they heard them quarrelling, saw their swords drawn, and the sword through Sir Charles P.'s body; and it appeared that the parties did not know each other before. When Sir Charles P. fell, Mr. W. took him by the nape of the neck, dashed his head upon the ground, and said, 'Damn you, you are dead!' Jenner, B., told the jury that this was only manslaughter: the jury, however, were disposed to find it murder, because of the dashing the head against the ground, &c.: but Allibone, J., repeated to them that it was manslaughter only, and they found accordingly. (z)

Lord Byron and Mr. Chaworth differed at a club as to the best means of procuring game. Mr. C. mentioned Sir C. Sedley's manors; Lord B. asked which they were; Mr. C. named Nuttall and another; Lord B. repeated his question: Mr. C. said, 'Surely you will allow Nuttall to be Sir C. Sedley's: but if you have anything more to say, you will find Sir C. Sedley in Dean Street, and me in Berkeley Row.' The conversation then dropped, and they stayed together at least half an hour; and Lord B. during that time conversed with a gentleman who sat next him: Mr. C. settled the bill, but made a mistake in marking the club-room, which might arise from agitation; he marked Lord B. as absent, though he was there. Mr. C. then went out, and a Mr. Donston followed him, of whom Mr. C. asked if he had been short with Lord B. in what he said last to him; to which Mr. Donston answered 'No,' and was returning into the room, when he met Lord B. coming out. Lord B. said to Mr. C., 'I want to speak to you;' upon which they both called the waiter, and were shown into a small room, and the waiter left a candle in the room. Lord B. asked Mr. C. if he meant the conversation upon game to Sir C. Sedley or to him; upon which Mr. C. said, 'If you have anything to say we had better shut the door, or we shall be heard,' and he shut the door. On turning from the door he saw Lord B.'s sword half drawn, and Lord B. said, 'Draw, draw!' Mr. C. drew, and thrust at Lord B.; and after one or two thrusts, Mr. C. received a mortal wound, of which he died. An indictment was preferred for murder; but upon the trial the peers (123) were unanimous that it was manslaughter only. (a)

In a case where there had been mutual blows, and then, upon one of the parties being pushed down on the ground, the other stamped upon his stomach and belly with great force, and thereby killed him, it was considered to be only manslaughter. The deceased, who was a French prisoner, had stolen a tobacco-box from one of a party of French prisoners who were gambling, and was chastised by some of the party for his conduct, and a clamour was raised against him. As he passed the prisoner, who was sitting at a table and much intoxicated, the prisoner got up, and with great force pushed the deceased backwards upon the ground. The deceased got up again and struck the prisoner two or three blows with his doubled fist in the face, and one blow in the eye; upon which the prisoner pushed the deceased backwards again in the same manner, and gave him, as he lay on his back upon the ground, two or three stamps with great force with his right foot on the stomach and belly; and afterwards, when the deceased arose on his seat and was sitting, gave him a strong kick in the face; the blood came out of the mouth and nose of the deceased, and he fell backwards, and died on the next day. The stamps upon the stomach and belly were the cause of his death. The prisoner was convicted of murder, on the ground that the violence which caused the death was not excused by heat of blood; but the learned Judge by whom the prisoner was tried, thinking that the case required further consideration, reserved it for that purpose, and the Judges were of opinion that it was only a case of manslaughter. (b)

First blow immaterial, if quarrel sudden, and combat equal.

A. uses provoking language or behaviour towards B., and B. strikes him, upon which a combat ensues, in which A. is killed, this is holden to be manslaughter; for it was a sudden affray, and they fought upon equal terms; and in such combats, upon sudden quarrels, it matters not who gave the first blow. (c) But it would be otherwise, if the terms were not equal, and if the party killing sought or took undue advantage; as if B., in the foregoing case, had drawn his sword, and made a pass at A., the sword of A. being then undrawn, and thereupon A. had drawn, and a combat had ensued, in which A. had been killed; for this would have been murder, inasmuch as B., by making the pass, his adversary's sword being undrawn, showed that he sought his blood. (d) And A.'s endeavour to defend himself, which he had a right to do, will not excuse B.; but if B. had first drawn, and forborne till his adversary had drawn too, it had been no more than manslaughter. (e)*

And such an indulgence is shown to the frailty of human nature, that where two persons, who have formerly fought on malice, are afterwards, to all appearance, reconciled, and fight again on a fresh quarrel, it shall not be presumed that they were moved by the old grudge, unless it appear by the whole circumstances of the case. (f)

If the combat be equal at the onset, the use of a deadly weapon afterwards will not make the offence more than manslaughter.

Though, from the preceding cases, it appears that not only the occasion must be sudden, but that the party assaulted must be put upon an equal footing in point of defence at the onset, to save the party making the first assault and killing from the guilt of murder; yet if, on any sudden quarrel, blows pass without any intention to kill or injure another materially, and in the course of the scuffle, after the parties are heated by the contest, one kill the other with a deadly weapon, it will only amount to manslaughter. (g) But we have seen that the conclusion* would be different if there were any previous intention or preparation to use such a weapon in the course of the affray. (h)

John Taylor, a Scotch soldier, and two other Scotchmen, were drinking together in an alchouse, when some servants to the owner of the house, who were also drinking in another box, abused the Scotch nation, and used several provoking expressions towards Taylor and his company, on which Taylor struck one of the servants with a small rattan cane, not bigger than a man's little finger, and another of the Scotchmen struck the same servant with his fist; the servant who was struck went out of the room into the yard, to fetch his fellow-servants to turn Taylor and his company out of the room; and, in the meantime, an altercation ensued between Taylor and the deceased, who was the owner of the house, but not the occupier, and who had come into the room after the servant went into the yard. He insisted that Taylor should pay for his liquor, and go out of the house; and Taylor, after some further altercation, was going away, when the deceased laid hold of him by the collar, and said, 'he should not go away till he had paid for the liquor;' and then threw him down against a settle. Taylor then paid for the liquor; whereupon the deceased laid hold of him again by the collar, and shoved him out of the room into the passage; and Taylor then said, 'that he did not mind killing an Englishman more than eating a mess of crowdy.' The servant, who had been originally struck with the cane, then came and assisted the deceased, who had hold of Taylor's collar; and together they violently pushed him out of the door of the alchouse; whereupon Taylor instantly turned round, drew his sword, and gave the deceased the mortal wound. This was adjudged manslaughter. (i)

Taylor's case.

The prisoner, a shoemaker, lived near the deceased. One afternoon the prisoner, very much intoxicated by liquor, passed accidentally by the house of the deceased's mother, while the deceased was thatching an adjacent barn. They entered into conversation; but on the prisoner's abusing the mother and sister of the deceased, very high words arose on both sides, and they placed themselves in a posture to fight. The mother of the deceased, hearing them quarrel, came out of her house, threw water over the prisoner, hit him in the face with her hand, and prevented them from boxing. The prisoner went into his own house; and in a few minutes came out again, and sat himself down upon a bench before his garden gate, at a small distance from the door of his house, with a shoemaker's knife in his hand, with which he was cutting the heel of a shoe. The deceased having finished his thatching, was returning, in his way home, by the prisoner's house; and on passing the prisoner, as he sat on the bench, the deceased called out to him, 'Are not you an aggravating rascal?' The prisoner replied, 'What will you be, when you are got from your master's feet?' On which the deceased seized the prisoner by the collar, and dragging him off the bench, they both rolled down into the cartway. While they were struggling and fighting, the prisoner underneath, and the deceased upon him, the deceased cried out, 'You rogue, what do you do with that knife in your hand?' and made an attempt to secure it; but the prisoner kept striking about with one hand, and held the deceased so hard with the other hand, that the deceased could not disengage himself. He made, however, a vigorous effort, and by that means drew the prisoner from the ground; and during this struggle the prisoner gave a blow, on which the deceased immediately exclaimed, 'The rogue has stabbed me to the heart; I am a dead man;' and expired. Upon inspection, it appeared that he had received three wounds, one very small on the right breast; another on the left thigh, two inches deep, and half an inch wide; and the mortal wound on the left breast. After great argument and consideration, the Judges determined that the offence was only manslaughter. (k)

It appears that the Judges thought in this case, that there was not sufficient evidence that the prisoner lay in wait for the deceased, with a malicious design to provoke him, and under that colour, to revenge his former quarrel, by stabbing him, which would have made it murder. On the contrary, he had composed himself to work at his own door, in a summer's evening; and when the deceased passed by, neither provoked him by word nor gesture. The deceased began first by ill language, and afterwards by collaring and dragging him from his seat, and rolling him in the road. The knife was used openly before the deceased came by, and not concealed from the bystanders; though the deceased in his passion did not perceive it till they were both down. And though the prisoner was not justifiable in using such a weapon on such an occasion, yet it being already in his hand, and the attack upon him very violent and sudden, the Judges thought that the offence only amounted to manslaughter; and the prisoner was recommended for a pardon. (l)

Upon an indictment for maliciously cutting, it appeared that the prisoner and the prosecutor, both being intoxicated, a quarrel ensued; the prosecutor struck the first blow, and they fought for a few minutes, when the prisoner ran back a short distance, and the prosecutor pursued, and overtook him, on which the prisoner, who had taken out his knife in his retreat, gave the prosecutor a cut across the abdomen. Park, J. A. J., 'The question I shall leave to the jury is this, whether the prisoner ran back with a malicious intention of getting out his knife to inflict an injury on the prosecutor, and so to gain an advantage in the conflict? for if he did, notwithstanding the previous fighting between them on equal terms, and the prosecutor having struck the first blow, I am of opinion that if death had ensued, the crime would have been murder; or whether the prisoner, bonâ fide, ran away from the prosecutor with intention to escape from an adversary of superior strength, but finding himself pursued, drew his knife to defend himself? as in this latter case, if the prosecutor had been killed, the crime would have been manslaughter only.' dispute arose between them about a bet. The prisoner said he had won, and the deceased refused to pay; the prisoner went to lay hold of him, and the deceased pushed him away; the prisoner went again to lay hold of the deceased, and was again pushed away; they then got hold of each other and there was a struggle, and they pushed about from one side to another; no blows were struck, but there were three falls, and the deceased fell undermost each time, and the third time the prisoner's knees came upon the lower part of the stomach of the deceased, and ruptured the intestines, which rupture caused the death. Patteson, J., told the jury that 'all struggles in anger, whether by fighting, or wrestling, or any other mode — all kinds of contests in anger, are unlawful. And if you think the deceased's death was occasioned by an act of the prisoner in a struggle of that kind, I cannot tell you that it does not amount to manslaughter. If the prisoner was struggling, but did not attempt to throw him, I should tell you it is not a case of manslaughter; but it is for you to say whether that is the fact or not. If the prisoner laid hold of the deceased in anger, and struggled with him and threw him, then it is a case of manslaughter. If you can collect from the circumstances that the prisoner was pulled down against his will, and, in consequence, fell upon the deceased, then he will not be guilty. But there does not seem anything in the evidence to show that the prisoner evinced any disposition to give up the contest; on the contrary, it appears that the contest was continued till the fall, which occasioned the death. You have been told by the counsel for the prisoner that you must be satisfied that the death was occasioned by the wilful act of the prisoner. In one sense of the word "wilful" I agree with him. I take it for granted he does not mean by it malicious or intending to do injury, but that it must be an act of the will, and that it must be shown that the prisoner attempted to throw the deceased. They had no right to struggle in this way; if it had been an amicable contest in wrestling, to see who was the best man, that would be quite a different matter.'⁽ⁿ⁾

It is said, that he shall be adjudged guilty of manslaughter, who, seeing two persons fighting together on a private quarrel, whether sudden or malicious, takes part with one of them, and kills the other.^(o) And it seems clear that if a master, maliciously intending to kill another, take his servants with him without acquainting them with his purpose, and meet his adversary, and fight with him, and the servants, seeing their master engaged, take part with him, and kill the other, they would be guilty of manslaughter only, but the master of murder.^(p) From this it follows, à fortiori, that if a man servant or friend, or even a stranger, coming suddenly, and seeing him fighting with another man, side with him, and kill the other man, or seeing his sword broken send him another, wherewith he kills the other man, such servant, friend, or stranger, will be only guilty of manslaughter.^(q) But this supposes that the person interfering does not know that the fighting is upon malice; for though if A. and B. fight upon malice, and C., the friend or servant of A., not being acquainted therewith, come in and take part against B., and kill him, this (though murder in A.) is only manslaughter in C.; yet it would be otherwise, if C. had known that the fighting was upon malice, for then it would be murder in both. If A., having been assaulted, retreats as far as he can, and then his servant kills the assailant, it will be only homicide se defendendo; but if the servant had killed him before the master had retreated as far as he could, it would have been manslaughter in the servant. And the law is the same in the case of the master killing the other in defence of the servant. (r)

case.

Where Ferdinando Cary and Oseband were in a field fighting upon a quarrel, and Sir M. Cary casually riding by, and seeing them in fight, and his kinsman one of them, rode in, drew his sword, thrust Oseband through and killed him; Coke, C. J., and the rest of the Court agreed that this is clearly but manslaughter in him, and murder in the other; for the one may have malice and the other not; he may come in by chance, and so kill the other. (s)

Interfering with intent to part com-

If two persons be fighting, and another interfere with intent to part them, but do not signify such intent, and he be killed by one of the combatants, this is but manslaughter. (t) And if a third person should take up the cause of one who has been worsted in mutual combat, and should attack the conqueror, and be killed by him, the killing would, it seems, be manslaughter. A. and B. were walking together in Fleet Street, and B. gave some provoking language to A., who, thereupon, gave B. a box on the ear, upon which they closed, and B. was thrown down, and his arm broken. Presently B. ran to his brother's house, which was hard by; and C., his brother, taking the alarm, came out with his sword drawn, and made towards A., who retreated ten or twelve yards; and C. pursuing him, A. drew his sword, made a pass at C., and killed him. A. being indicted for murder, the Court directed the jury to find it manslaughter, not murder, because it was upon a sudden falling out, not se defendendo, partly because A. made the first breach of the peace by striking B.; and partly because, unless he had fled as far as might be, it could not be said to be in his own defence; and it appeared plainly upon the evidence, that he might have retreated out of danger, and that his stepping back was rather to have an opportunity to draw his sword, and with more advantage to come upon C., than to avoid him; and accordingly, at last, it was found manslaughter. (u)

Where upon an indictment for wounding under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it appeared that the prisoner and the prosecutor's brother were fighting, and the prosecutor laid hold of the prisoner in order to prevent him from beating his brother, and held him down on a locker, but did not strike him, and the prisoner then stabbed him;

the jury were directed, that if they were of opinion that the prosecutor did nothing more than was necessary to prevent the prisoner from beating his brother, the crime, if death had ensued, would have been murder; but if they thought that the prosecutor did more than was necessary to prevent the prisoner from beating the brother, or that he struck any blows, then it would have been manslaughter. (v)

A party of men were playing at bowls, when two of them fell out and quarrelled; and a third man who had not any quarrel, in revenge of his friend, struck the other with a bowl, of which blow he died; and this was held manslaughter, because it happened upon a sudden motion in revenge of his friend. (w) But it must be intended that the two men who fell out were actually fighting together at the time; for if words only had passed between them, it would have been murder; nothing but an open affray or striving being such a provocation to one person to meddle with an injury done to another as will lessen the offence to manslaughter, if a man be killed by the person so meddling. (x)

Though Lord Hale and others appear sometimes to intimate a distinction between the interference of servants and friends, and that of a mere stranger, yet the limits between them do not appear to be anywhere actually defined. And it has been observed, that the nearer or more remote connexion of the parties with each other seems to be more a matter of observation to the jury as to the probable force of the provocation, and the motive which induced the interference, than as furnishing any precise rule of law grounded on such a distinction. (y)

As a blow aimed with malice at one individual, and by mistake or accident falling upon another and killing him, will amount to murder; (z) so if a blow intended against A. and lighting on B. arose from such a sudden transport of passion as, in case A. had died by it, would have reduced the offence to manslaughter, the fact will admit of the same alleviation, if it should happen to kill B. (a)

A widow finding that one of her sons had not prepared her dinner as she had directed him to do, began to scold him, upon which he made her some very impertinent answers, which put her in a passion, and she took up a small piece of iron used as a poker, intending to frighten him, and seeing she was very angry he ran towards the door of the room, when she threw the poker at him, and it happened that the deceased was just coming in at the moment, and the iron struck him on the head, and caused his death; Park, J. A. J., told the jury, ‘No doubt this poor woman had no more intention of injuring this particular child than I have, but that makes no difference in law. If a blow is aimed at an individual unlawfully — and this was undoubtedly unlawful, as an improper mode of correction — and strikes another and kills him, it is manslaughter, and there is no doubt, if the child at whom the blow was aimed had been struck, and died, it would have been manslaughter, and so it is under the present circumstances.' (b)

Brown's case.

A quarrel arose between some soldiers and a number of keelmen at Sandgate; and, a violent affray ensuing, one of the soldiers was stripped, and a party of five or six came up and beat him cruelly. A woman called out from a window, 'You rogues, you will murder the man!' The prisoner, who was a soldier, had before driven part of the mob down the street with his sword in the scabbard; and on his return, seeing his comrade thus used, drew his sword, and bid the mob stand clear, saying, he would sweep the street; and, on their pressing on him, he struck at them with the flat side of the sword several times; upon which they fled, and he pursued them. The soldier who was stripped got up, and ran into a passage to save himself. The prisoner returned, and asked if they had murdered his comrade; and the people came back, and assaulted him several times, and then ran from him. He sometimes brandished his sword; and then struck fire with the blade of it upon the stones of the street, calling out to the people to keep off. At this time the deceased, who had a blue jacket on, and might be mistaken for a keelman, was going along about five yards from the soldier; but, before he passed, the soldier went to him, and struck him on the head with his sword, of which blow he almost immediately expired. It was the opinion of two witnesses that, if the soldier had not drawn his sword, they would both of them have been murdered. The Judges were clearly of opinion that this was only manslaughter. (c)

SEC. III.

Cases of Resistance to Officers of Justice; to Persons acting in their Aid; and to Private Persons lawfully interfering to apprehend Felons, or to prevent a Breach of the Peace.

It has been before mentioned as a general rule, that where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, and using the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, and killed, it will be murder in all who take part in such resistance. (d) But this protection of the law is extended only to persons who have proper authority, and who use that authority in a proper manner; (e) wherefore questions of nicety and difficulty have frequently arisen upon the points of authority, legality of process, notice, and regularity of proceeding; and as the consequence of defects in any of these particulars is in general that the offence of killing the person resisted, is extenuated to manslaughter, it will be proper in this place to consider some of those questions which have met with judicial decision.

or suspended under sec. 9. Upon an indictment for the murder of J. Nutt, it appeared that Nutt was appointed on the 9th of February, 1832, by two justices, in writing, and under their hands, 'to act as a special constable for the parish of St. George, until he received notice that his service is suspended or determined.' Nutt was killed in conveying a prisoner to the station-house on the 16th of August, 1840; it was objected that Nutt did not continue a special constable till that time; but it was held that the appointment was indefinite in point of time, and remained valid and in force till it was either suspended or determined under sec. 9, and as Nutt's appointment was not shown to have been determined, he continued to be a special constable under the Act on the 16th of August, 1840, and had then, under sec. 5, all the ordinary powers of a common constable. (f)

The authority to arrest and imprison is greater in cases of felony than in matters of mere misdemeanor; and least of all in civil suits.

Authority of officers and others to arrest and imprison in cases of felony.

If a felony be committed, and the felon fly from justice, or a dangerous wound be given, it is the duty of every man to use his best endeavours to prevent an escape; and in such cases, if fresh suit be made, and à fortiori, if hue and cry be levied, all who join in aid of those, who began the pursuit, will be under the same protection of the law; and the same rule holds, if a felon, after arrest, break away as he is being carried to gaol, and his pursuers cannot retake him without killing him. (g) Thus, where upon a robbery committed by several, the party robbed raised hue and cry, and the country pursued the robbers, and one of the pursuers was killed by one of the robbers, it was held that this was murder, because the country, upon hue and cry levied, are authorised by law to pursue and apprehend the malefactors; and that, although there were no warrant of a justice of the peace, to raise hue and cry, nor any constable in the pursuit, yet the hue and cry was a good warrant in law for the pursuers to apprehend the felons; and that, therefore, the killing of any of the pursuers was murder. (h)

But where private persons use their endeavours to bring felons to justice, some cautions ought to be observed. In the first place, it should be ascertained that a felony has actually been committed, or that an actual attempt to commit a felony is being made by the party arrested; for if that be not the case, no suspicion, however well grounded, will bring the person so interposing within the protection, which the law extends to persons acting with proper authority. (i) If it is clear that a felony has been committed, the next consideration will be, whether it was committed by the person intended to be pursued or arrested; for, supposing a felony to have been actually committed, but not by the person arrested or pursued upon suspicion, this suspicion, though probably well founded, will not bring the person endeavouring to arrest or imprison within the protection of the law, so far as to excuse him from the guilt of manslaughter, if he should kill; or, on the other hand, to make the killing of him amount to murder. It seems that, in either case, it would only be manslaughter; the one not having used due diligence to be apprised of the truth of the fact, the other not having submitted and rendered himself to justice. Upon an indictment for wounding it appeared that the prisoner had asked leave to take a basket of ashes from the prosecutor's ashpit, which he was permitted to do. As he was carrying away the ashes the prosecutor's apprentice saw the spout of a new tea-kettle which had stood on a shelf near the ash-pit, among the ashes, and having given the alarm, the prosecutor seized the prisoner to detain him while a constable was sent for; the prisoner resisted, and in the struggle both fell, and the prisoner cut the prosecutor with a knife; a rattle of copper had been heard while the prisoner was at the ash-pit; it was objected that the prosecutor had no right to detain the prisoner. If he had stolen the tea-kettle, the prosecutor had a right to detain him, and this wounding will be felony.' (l)

But the Judges held that the prisoner being detected in the night attempting to commit a felony, might be lawfully detained without a warrant, until he could be carried before a magistrate. (m)

Distinctions between the authority of officers and private persons.

These distinctions between officers and private persons proceed upon the principle of discouraging persons from proceeding to extremities upon their own private suspicion or authority. And upon this principle, it appears to have been considered, that a private person is not bound to arrest anyone standing indicted for felony against whom no warrant can be produced at the time; and, therefore, the law does not hold out the same indemnity to such person, as it does to constables and other peace officers, who are ex officio, not merely permitted, but enjoined by law, to arrest the parties, as well on probable suspicion of felony, as in case of felony actually committed; and who may therefore well arrest upon the finding of the fact by the grand inquest on oath, which is suspicion grounded on high authority. (n) In this case, however, it might perhaps be well contended, that a person arresting another with the knowledge of the indictment having been found, cannot be properly considered as acting upon his own private suspicion or authority; and ought, therefore, to have the same protection as the officer of justice. And it seems agreed, that the indictment found is a good cause of arrest by private persons, if it may be made without the death of the felon; (o) but it is said, that, if he be killed, their justification must depend upon the fact of the party's guilt, which it will be incumbent on them to make out; otherwise, they will be guilty of manslaughter. (p)

Even in the case of a constable, it was formerly supposed to be necessary that there should have been a felony committed in fact, which the constable must have ascertained at his peril; but it has since been determined, that a peace officer may justify an arrest on a charge of felony, on reasonable cause of suspicion, without a warrant; although it should afterwards appear that no felony had been committed. (q) And where a private person suspecting another of felony, has laid his grounds of suspicion before a constable, and required his assistance to take him, the constable may justify killing the party, if he fly, and cannot otherwise be taken, though in truth he were innocent. But in such case, where no hue and cry is levied, the party suspecting ought to be present, as the justification must be that the constable did aid him in taking the party suspected; and the constable ought to be informed of the grounds of suspicion, that he may judge of the reasonableness of it. (r) 'There is this distinction between a private individual and a constable; in order to justify the former in causing the imprisonment of a person, he must not only make out a reasonable ground of suspicion, but he must prove that a felony has actually been committed; whereas a constable, having reasonable ground to suspect that a felony has been committed, is authorized to detain the party suspected until enquiry can be made by the proper authorities.' (s)

A magistrate has no authority to detain a person known to him till some other person makes a charge against him; before he detains a person known, he ought to have a charge actually made. Upon an indictment for false imprisonment of one Smyth, it appeared that Smyth went to a police office, where two magistrates were sitting, to make a complaint, which was dismissed, and he

Where is the person that has got the information to lay against him for tampering with the due course of justice?' On which he was detained. For the defendants it was opened, that the magistrates were informed that an officer had a complaint to make against Smyth for having tampered with the due course of justice; and that the officer not being then at the office, Smyth was detained till he was sent for; and it was contended that, if a magistrate has a person before him charged with either felony or misdemeanor, he may either go into the case immediately, or detain the party to await his pleasure. Ford's case.
Arrest on charge of felony imperfectly expressed.

Killing an officer will amount to murder, though he has no warrant, and was not present when any felony was committed, but takes the party upon a charge only; and though such charge does not in terms specify all the particulars necessary to constitute the felony. And it appears that it will be no excuse for killing an officer that such officer was proceeding to handcuff the party who was in his custody upon a charge of felony. The prisoner had produced a forged bank note; and from his conduct at the time, which justified a suspicion that he knew it to be forged, he was apprehended and taken to a constable, and delivered with the note to the constable; and the charge to the constable was, 'because he had a forged note in his possession.' After he had been in custody at the constable's some hours, the constable was handcuffing him to another man, when he pulled out a pistol and shot the constable. The constable was not killed, but the prisoner was indicted upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58; and it was urged on his behalf that the charge imported no legal offence, for unless he knew the note to be forged he was no felon; and if the charge was insufficient, the arrest was illegal; and killing the officer (if that had taken place) would have been only manslaughter. But the Judges were all of opinion that this defect in the charge was immaterial; that it was not necessary for such a charge to contain the same accurate description of the offence as would be required in an indictment; and that the charge in question must have been considered as imputing to the prisoner a guilty possession. (w)

Where on an indictment for wounding with intent to prevent the lawful apprehension of the prisoner, the evidence was that the prosecutor, a police constable, went with a brother officer, both being in plain clothes, and with two other policemen in uniform, to a public-house, and told the prisoner that he wanted him on a charge of a highway robbery; he had no warrant, but from information he had received he thought it his duty to apprehend the prisoner. The prisoner asked him for further information relative to the charge, which he refused to give, and the prisoner then told him that he would not go to the station-house unless he was told why, or by what authority, he was apprehended, and he wounded the officer on his proceeding to apprehend him; it was objected that the prisoner must be aware at the time that the apprehension was lawful, and there was nothing here to show that that was the fact. Talfourd, J., held, that to support this charge it was enough that the prisoner was lawfully apprehended. If the apprehension was in fact lawful, the question whether or not the prisoner believed it to be lawful, could not be permitted to be considered. The prisoner was not to erect a tribunal in his mind to decide whether he was legally accused or not. He was taken into custody by an officer of the law, and it was his duty to obey the law. (x)

Where an arrest by a constable would have been clearly illegal, an attempt to make it under the circumstances was held to be such a provocation as would have reduced the case to manslaughter if death had ensued. On an indictment for stabbing with intent to murder, upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, it appeared that the prisoner, a journeyman shoemaker, applied to his master for some money, which was refused until he should have finished his work; he applied again subsequently, was again refused, and became abusive, upon which his master threatened to send for a constable. The prisoner then refused to finish his work; and said that he would go up stairs and pack up his tools, and that no constable should stop him. He went up stairs, came down again with his tools, and drawing from the sleeve of his coat a naked knife, said he would do for the first bloody constable that offered to stop him; he was ready to die, and would have a life before he lost his own. He then made a flourishing motion with the knife, put it up his sleeve again, and left the shop. The master then applied to a constable to take the prisoner into custody: making no charge further than saying that he suspected the prisoner had tools of his, and was leaving his work undone. The constable said he would take him if the master would give charge of him; and they proceeded together to the yard of an inn, where they found the prisoner in a public privy, as if he had occasion there; the privy had no door to it. The master said, 'That is the man, and I give you in charge of him;' upon which the constable said to the prisoner, 'My good fellow, your master gives me charge of you, you must go with me.' The prisoner, without saying anything, presented the knife, and stabbed the constable under the left breast, and attempted to make several other blows, which the constable parried off with his staff. The prisoner having been found guilty, upon a case reserved, the majority of the Judges (y) held, that as an actual arrest would have been illegal, the attempt to make it when the prisoner was in such a situation that he could not get away, and when the waiting to give notice might have enabled the constable to complete the arrest, was such a provocation as, if death had ensued, would have made the case manslaughter only; and that therefore the conviction was wrong. Killing an officer attempting to arrest without a warrant on a charge of felony, is murder, though no felony be committed, and no notice of the charge given.

Killing an officer who attempts to arrest a man will be murder, though the officer had no warrant, and though the man has done nothing, for which he was liable to be arrested, if the officer has a charge against him for felony. and the man knows the individual to be an officer, though the officer do not notify to him that he has such a charge. Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it appeared that the prisoners had attempted to push a man into a ditch, upon which a scuffle ensued. The prisoners walked on, and the man complained to Harrison, a watchman, that they had attempted to rob him, desired him to arrest them, followed them till Harrison came up to them, and then said, sufficiently loud for them to hear, 'That's them.' There was no evidence of any attempt by the prisoners to rob the man, and the only person who saw the transaction negatived it. When Harrison came up to the prisoners, all he said to them was, 'You must go back and come along with me.' He did not explain why, nor was any charge against the prisoners stated. He was dressed in a watchman's coat, and had his lantern. W., one of the prisoners, said, 'keep off,' and drew a sharp instrument from his side; the watchman said, 'it's of no use, you must go back.' A third man put himself in a position as if to strike the watchman, and W. made a spring at him, and caught one of the skirts of his coat; the watchman pulled out his staff, and turned at the prisoners, and they came at him. The watchman struck at W., and hit him on the thick part of the arm with his staff; W. immediately stabbed the watchman, and another of the prisoners followed the watchman, and made another blow at him with another knife. The place where the prisoners attempted to push the man into the ditch was within the limits of the hamlet, for which Harrison was watchman, but the place where he overtook the prisoners did not appear to be within those limits. The jury found that the prisoners knew Harrison to be a watchman. Bayley, B., doubted whether, as no felony had been committed, and there had been no breach of the peace in Harrison's presence, he could legally arrest, at least without first stating to the prisoners why he purposed to arrest, and he also doubted his power out of the limits of his hamlet; and he reserved the case for the opinion of the Judges, nine of whom held that the watchman could legally arrest the prisoners without saying that he had a charge of robbery against them, though the prisoners had in fact done nothing to warrant the arrest; and that, had death ensued, it would have been murder. Four of the Judges (a) were of a contrary opinion. (b)

Authority to arrest and imprison in cases of misdemeanors.

A constable, or other known conservator of the peace, may lawfully interpose upon his own view to prevent a breach of the peace, and to quiet an affray; and if he or any of his assistants, whether commanded or not, be killed, it will be murder in all who take part in the resistance; there being either implied or express notification of the character in which he interposed. It has, however, often been questioned, how far a constable or other peace officer is authorized to arrest a person upon a charge by another of a mere breach of the peace, after the affray is ended, and peace restored, without a warrant from a magistrate; (d) and it is now settled that he has no such authority.

If a constable take a man without a warrant, upon a charge of ill-using a person, which ill-usage was not in the presence of the constable, and therefore gives him no authority to do so, and the prisoner runs away, and is pursued by J. S., who was with the constable all the time, and charged by him to assist, and the man kill J. S. to prevent his retaking him, it will not be murder, but manslaughter only; because the arrest was illegal, and J. S. ought to have known it was, and then his attempt to retake was illegal also: and that though the prisoner, while in custody of the constable, struck the man by whom the charge was given; because a blow whilst he was under the influence of the provocation from the illegal arrest caused by such man, would not justify the constable in detaining him: at least it will make no difference if the blow was not likely to be followed with dangerous consequences, nor make a new and distinct ground of detainer. Upon an indictment for maliciously cutting Walby, it appeared that a man travelling upon the highway told the constable that a man coming along the road had been ill-using him, and charged the constable, in the prisoner's hearing, to take the prisoner before a magistrate for so misusing him; on which the constable, meeting the prisoner passing along the highway, ordered him to stop for insulting a man on the road, laid hold of him, tapped him on the shoulder, said he was his prisoner, and that he should take him to a magistrate, and ordered Walby to assist him, which W. did, and to which the prisoner submitted. No particulars of what the supposed ill-usage or insult consisted of appeared in evidence, nor did they pass in the constable's view or hearing, and therefore the apprehension and detainer appeared clearly thus far to have been unlawful. Afterwards, and whilst the prisoner was thus in custody, and before they found a magistrate, the prisoner struck the man, in the constable's presence, who had made the charge against him, and the constable then also told the prisoner he should take him before a magistrate; and some time afterwards, as they were proceeding along to a magistrate's, the prisoner ran away, and attempted to escape, but was pursued by W. by the constable's order; and being overtaken by him, refused to stop, asking W. where his authority was, who said it was in his hand, alluding to a stick, which W. then had in his hand, and which the prisoner had given up to him at the commencement of the detainer; and without further information, when W. was going authorities have holden that such officer may arrest the party upon the charge of another, though the affray be over, for the purpose of bringing him before a justice, to find sureties of the peace, or for appearance. 2 Hale, 90. to take hold of him, the prisoner told him if he would not let him go he would stab him, and then gave him the cut in the face, for which he was thus indicted. Holroyd, J., doubted whether the effect of the first illegal custody might not operate upon the circumstances that subsequently took place, as a defence against the present indictment, either in rendering even the subsequent imprisonment tortious, or depriving the prisoner's conduct of the necessary legal ingredient of malice; and he reserved the case for the opinion of the Judges, who held that the original arrest was illegal, and that the recaption would have been illegal, and therefore the case would not have been murder if death had ensued. (e)

If an affray be over, a constable has no power to apprehend the persons engaged in it.

Upon the trial of an action for an assault, it appeared that about midnight there was a disturbance, and ringing and knocking at many doors; that the disturbance continued about three hours, and about three o'clock in the morning the high constable asked the plaintiff to assist him in taking the parties into custody, and that the plaintiff went into the street, and that one White desired the defendant to go home, and the defendant replied, 'If you do not leave me alone, I will knock your brains out, or give you a good ducking;' whereupon the plaintiff and White laid hold of the defendant to convey him to the cage; and when near the cage door, all three fell down: and it was imputed that at this time the defendant kicked the plaintiff on the leg, which was the injury for which the action was brought. Alderson, B., told the jury, 'The questions for your consideration in this case are, whether the defendant was engaged in the affray; whether the constable had view of the affray while he was so engaged in it; and whether the affray was continuing at the time that he ordered the plaintiff to apprehend the defendant. If you are satisfied that all these points are made out, then, if the defendant assaulted the plaintiff while the plaintiff was endeavouring to apprehend him, such assault is unjustifiable, and the verdict ought to be for the plaintiff. If, however, there had been an affray, and that affray were over, then the constable had not, and ought not, to have the power of apprehending the persons engaged in it: for the power is given by law to prevent a breach of the peace; and where a breach of the peace had been committed, and was over, the constable must proceed in the same way as any other person, namely, by obtaining a warrant from a magistrate. You must, therefore, before you find for the plaintiff, be satisfied that the defendant was a party to the affray, and that the affray was continuing at the time of his apprehension. The right of the plaintiff to apprehend the defendant is a serious question, involving the power of constables, and a wrong decision upon it would materially affect the liberty of the subject. The words used by the defendant would be no justification for his apprehension, unless he was a party to the affray; and you think that those words showed that the affray was still continuing. If the apprehension of the defendant were unlawful, he had, unquestionably, a right to struggle to get away; but, if the apprehension was lawful, he had no right to do so, and is answerable for all the consequences.' (f) Cook v. Nethercote, 6 C. & P. 741.

Upon an indictment for maliciously stabbing with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner, about half-past ten at night, went to a house and demanded to see the servant girl. He was desired to quit the house, which he refused to do, and the prosecutor, who was a constable, was sent for. Before the prosecutor came, the prisoner left the house and went into the garden. In about twenty minutes the prosecutor came. The prisoner did nothing in his presence; but upon the prisoner saying, 'if a light appear at the windows, I will break every one of them,' the prosecutor took him into custody, and he afterwards cut the prosecutor with a knife; it was submitted that the arresting the prisoner was illegal, as nothing had been done by him in breach of the peace in the presence of the constable. Parke, J., 'I think that the detention of the prisoner by the prosecutor was illegal. There was no breach of the peace when the prisoner was taken into custody.'(g)

Upon an indictment for assaulting the prosecutor, an officer in the police, in the execution of his duty, it appeared that the prosecutor was informed that a disturbance was going on in Patfield, and went thither, and found the prisoner's wife sitting crying under a hedge opposite their cottage, and he went with her into the cottage, and found the prisoner intoxicated, but sufficiently sober to know what he was doing. In his hearing, the wife stated to the prosecutor that the prisoner had knocked her down and beaten her shamefully. One Cook was present, and stated that he had seen the prisoner knock his wife down and jump upon her, and Cook had, in fact, seen this done a short time previously. The prisoner said nothing on hearing these statements. Prosecutor left the cottage, and the prisoner and his wife in it. The prisoner then closed the shutters, and locked the door. The prosecutor heard the prisoner using threatening language to his wife, and saw her run out of the cottage. The prisoner said he would lock her out all night, and thereupon she returned into the cottage. The prosecutor heard the prisoner again use very violent language, and opened the shutters, and saw the prisoner take up a shovel and hold it in a threatening attitude over his wife's head, and heard him say, 'If it was not for the bloody policeman outside I would split your head open, for 'tis you that sent for the policeman.' The prisoner was near enough to have struck his wife when he raised the shovel. Shortly afterwards he desired her to go to bed, and she replied, 'I can't go up stairs in this state; I don't know one hour from another when I might be murdered.' Prisoner said with an oath, 'I'll leave you altogether,' and went out. This was about twenty minutes after he had raised the shovel. He went on the highway towards his father's house, and when he had walked about seventy yards from his cottage the prosecutor took him into custody. He had no warrant. Cook had been with the prosecutor all the time these things occurred, and insisted on his taking the prisoner into custody, because he thought it would not be safe to let him go back to his wife that night. The prisoner, on being taken into custody, assaulted the prosecutor. And, upon a case reserved, it was held that the prosecutor was in the execution of his duty when he was assaulted. It is not necessary that a policeman should arrest a man at the very moment he sees an assault committed; it is quite sufficient if he arrests recently after the right to do so arises. It cannot be said, that because the prisoner was going away from the house, the constable was bound to come to the conclusion that the danger was over. As a conservator of the peace, he had authority to take the prisoner into custody, he having so recently witnessed the commission of an assault. Here there was a continuing danger and a continuing pursuit, and it was the duty of the policeman to exercise his authority in this case, in order to prevent a further breach of the peace, and also that the prisoner might be dealt with according to law in respect of the assault he had so recently committed. [601]

In all cases of misdemeanor there is no power to apprehend after the misdemeanor has been committed.

There is no distinction as to the power to apprehend between one kind of misdemeanor and another, as between a breach of the peace and fraud, but the rule is general, that in all cases of misdemeanor there is no power to apprehend after the misdemeanor has been committed. To trespass for false imprisonment, the defendant pleaded that an evil-disposed person, to him unknown, had obtained goods from him by false pretences; that the plaintiff afterwards passed by the defendant's shop, and was pointed out to him by his servant as the person who had so obtained the goods, whereupon the defendant, vehemently suspecting that the plaintiff was the person who had committed the offence, gave charge of him to a police officer to be taken before a magistrate; and upon this plea the defendant had a verdict. It was contended, in showing cause against a rule for judgment non obstante veredicto, that offences partaking of the nature of a felony, as a fraud, which borders upon a theft, might come under a different rule from misdemeanors, which merely constituted a breach of the peace. [Lord Tenterden, C. J.: 'The distinction between felony and misdemeanor is well known and recognized, but is there any authority for distinguishing between one kind of misdemeanor and another?'] It was admitted that there was no direct authority, but 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 12, s. 20, and 2 Hale, 88, 89, were relied upon. Lord Tenterden, C. J.: 'The instances in Hawkins are where the party is caught in the fact, and the observation there added assumes that the party was guilty. Here the case is only of suspicion. The instances in Hale, of arrest on suspicion after the fact is over, relate to felony. In cases of misdemeanor, it is much better that the parties should apply to a justice of peace for a warrant than take the law into their own hands, which they are too apt to do. The rule must be made absolute.' (i)

Nor does the London Police Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 94, s. 8, empower a constable of the city of London to apprehend a person without a warrant, on suspicion that he had previously committed a misdemeanor. (k)

(h) Reg. v. Light, D. & B. C. C. 332.

(i) Fox v. Gaunt, 3 B. & Ad 798.

(k) Bowditch v. Balchin, 5 Exc. R. 378. The misdemeanor was perjury. The section empowers 'any person belonging to the said police force to take into custody, without warrant, all loose, idle, and disorderly persons, whom he shall find disturbing the public peace, or whom he shall have good cause to suspect of having committed or intending to commit any felony, misdemeanor, or breach of the peace,' &c.; and the Court held that the words 'loose, idle, and disorderly persons,' overrode the whole clause.

If one menace another to kill him, and complaint be made thereof to the constable forthwith, such constable may, in order to avoid the present danger, arrest the party, and detain him till he can conveniently bring him to a justice of the peace. (l)

It has been said, that if peace officers meet with night-walkers, or persons unduly armed, who will not yield themselves, but resist or fly before they are apprehended, and who are upon necessity slain, because they cannot otherwise be overtaken, it is no felony in the officers or their assistants, though the parties killed were innocent. (m) But it is doubted whether, at this day, so great a degree of severity would be either justifiable or necessary (especially in the case of bare flight), unless there were a reasonable suspicion of felony. (n) And it has been considered, that the taking up of a person in the night, as a night-walker and disorderly person, though by a lawful officer, would be illegal, if the person so arrested were innocent, and there were no reasonable grounds of suspicion to mislead the officer. (o) Where a private Act authorized watchmen to apprehend night-walkers, malefactors, and suspicious persons, and a watchman apprehended a gentleman returning from a party for uttering some words in a street at night, it was held that the apprehension was illegal, for by night-walkers is meant such persons as are in the habit of being out at night for some wicked purpose. (p) So the words 'suspected person or reputed thief,' in the 3 Geo. 4, c. 55, s. 21 (the former London Police Act), were directed against persons of general

(l) 2 Hale, 88. This power seems to be grounded on the duty of the officer to prevent a probable felony, and must be governed by the same rules which apply to that case; though Dalton (ch. 116, s. 3) extends it even to the prevention of a battery. Vide 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 72, p. 306.

(o) Tooley's case, 2 Lord Raym. 1296. There is a MS. note of this case given by the editor of Lord Hale (2 Hale, 89), which states Lord Holt to have said, that of late constables had made a practice of taking up people only for walking the streets: but that he knew not whence they had such authority. But see Lawrence v. Hedger, 3 Taunt. 14, where it was holden that watchmen and beadles have authority, at common law, to arrest and detain in prison, for examination, persons walking in the streets at night, whom there is reasonable ground to suspect of felony, although there is no proof of felony having been committed. And it has been said by Hawkins and others, that every private person may, by the common law, arrest any suspicious night-walker, and detain him till he give a good account of himself. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 13, s. 6, c. 12, s. 20; and it has been held that a person may be indicted for being a common night-walker, as for a misdemeanor. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 12, s. 20. Latch. 173. Poph. 208. Authority of officers in public-houses.

[603]

If a person make such a disturbance in a public-house as alarms the

suspicious character, and frequenting places where they might be reasonably suspected of resorting for felonious purposes. (q)

Questions not unfrequently arise as to the authority of constables and other officers to interfere with persons in inns or beer-houses. (r) It is no part of a policeman's duty to turn a person out of an inn, although he may be conducting himself improperly there, unless his conduct tends to a breach of the peace. The plaintiff was using abusive language in an inn to one of the persons there, on which the owner of the inn sent for a policeman, who, by his direction, took the plaintiff to the station-house. Patteson, J.: 'The landlord of an inn or public-house, or the occupier of a private house, whenever a person conducts himself as the plaintiff did, is justified in telling him to leave the house, and, if he will not do so, he is justified in putting him out by force, and may call in his servants to assist in so doing. He might also authorize a policeman to do it, but it would be no part of a policeman's duty as such, unless the party had committed some offence punishable by law; but although it would be no part of the policeman's duty to do this, it might be better in many cases that a policeman should assist the owner of the house in a matter of this kind, as he would probably get the person out of the house with less disturbance than the owner himself could do.' (s) Neither is it the duty of a policeman to prevent a person from going into a room in a public-house, unless a breach of the peace was likely to be committed by such person in that room. Upon an indictment for assaulting a policeman in the execution of his duty, it appeared that the policeman was called into a public-house to put an end to a disturbance which the defendant was making; he and the landlady were at high words; W. L. interfered, and the defendant was in the act of squaring at him when the policeman desired the defendant not to make a disturbance; the defendant, who was at the side of the bar, then attempted to go into the parlour, in which a person was sitting; as the defendant attempted to get into the parlour, the policeman collared him, and prevented his going in; he then struck the policeman; neither the landlord nor landlady had desired the policeman to turn the defendant out of the house. Parke, B.: 'The policeman had a right to be in the house without being called upon either by the landlord or landlady to interfere, but under the circumstances he had no authority to lay hold of the defendant, unless you are satisfied that a breach of the peace was likely to be committed by the defendant on the person in the parlour; and if you think it was not, it was no part of the policeman's duty to prevent the defendant from going into the parlour.' (t)

But if a person make such a noise and disturbance in a public-house as would create alarm and disquiet the neighbourhood, this would be such a breach of the peace as would justify a policeman in taking the party into custody, provided it took place in the

(r) The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, s. 4, makes it lawful for 'any constable at any time to enter into any house or place of public resort in England or Wales for the sale of beer, wine, spirits, or other fer-presence of the policeman. To trespass for false imprisonment the defendant pleaded that he was possessed of a public-house, and that the plaintiff was in the house, and conducted himself in a riotous, quarrelsome, disorderly, and uncivil manner, and committed a breach of the peace therein; that the plaintiff was requested to depart, and refused, whereupon the defendant gently laid his hands on the plaintiff to remove him, and because the plaintiff violently and forcibly resisted the said removal, the defendant gave him in charge to a watchman, who saw the said breach of peace: it appeared that a watchman, who was on duty, in consequence of hearing a noise, went into the defendant's public-house, where he found the plaintiff and five or six other young men making a disturbance; he led the plaintiff out of the house, and about fifteen yards along the street, and then let him go; he said he would go back and have his revenge, and went towards the public-house; the watchman went round his beat, and on his return he heard a person at the door of defendant's house cry 'Watch,' and he in consequence went in and found the plaintiff sitting down, he then sprang his rattle, and the defendant tried to put the plaintiff out of the house, the plaintiff having hold of the defendant's collar to resist being put out, on which the watchman took the plaintiff into custody, and took him to the watchhouse. Parke, B.: 'There is no doubt that a landlord may turn out a person who is making a disturbance in a public-house, though such disturbance does not amount to a breach of the peace. To do this the landlord may lay hands on him, and in so doing the landlord is not guilty of any breach of the peace. But if the person resists, and lays hands on the landlord, that is an unjustifiable assault upon the landlord; and, if the watchman in this case saw such assault committed, that would make out the plea. There might, it is true, be a sufficient breach of the peace to justify the defendant, as the landlord of the house, in giving the plaintiff into custody without this assault; and even if there was no assault at all. For if the plaintiff made such a noise and disturbance as would create alarm and would disquiet the neighbourhood, and the persons passing along the adjacent street, that would be such a breach of the peace as would not only authorize the landlord to turn the plaintiff out of the house, but it would also give the landlord a right to have the plaintiff taken into custody, if this occurred in the view of the watchman: the watchman has said he saw the piece of work the first time he went into the house. Now, if the plaintiff and others were then conducting themselves in a manner calculated to disturb the neighbourhood, this would justify the watchman in turning the plaintiff out, and in taking him into custody, if on his going to the house the second time he found the plaintiff still there.' (u) Where on an indictment for assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty it appeared that some persons were drinking at a late hour of the night in a barn attached to a public-house, and the landlord desired the constable to clear them out, and while he was doing so the prisoners assaulted him; Bramwell, B., said: 'The people were doing nothing illegal nor contrary to any Act of Parliament, and therefore the constable was not acting in the execution of his duty as such, although what he did may have been very laudable and proper. It would have been otherwise had there been a disturbance of the public peace, or any danger of a breach of the peace.' (v)

peace in a private house.

Where in an action for assaulting the plaintiff and giving him into custody, the defendant justified having done so, and his witnesses stated that the plaintiff, who was the butler of the defendant, was making a great noise in the defendant's house, and had quarrelled with the coachman, and that when the defendant came down stairs the plaintiff was abusive to him and violent in his manner, and making a great noise, and laid hold of him, and they struggled together; Lord Campbell, C. J., directed the jury, that if a person came into a house, or was in it, and made a noise and disturbed the peace of the family, although no assault had been committed, the master of the house might turn him out or call a policeman to do so; and if the plaintiff had assaulted his master and misconducted himself in the manner described by the defendant's witnesses, the defendant would be justified in giving the plaintiff in charge to the policeman, to be dealt with according to law. (w)

It has sometimes happened that peace officers have taken opposite parties in an affray, and the death of one of them has ensued; as in the case put by Lord Hale, where A. and B., being constables of the vill of C., and a riot or quarrel happening between several persons, A. joined with one party, and commanded the adverse party to keep the peace, and B. joined with the other party, and in like manner commanded the adverse party to keep the peace, and the assistants and party of A. in the tumult killed B. (x) This, Lord Hale says, seems but manslaughter, and not murder, inasmuch as the officers and their assistants were engaged one against the other, and each had as much authority as the other: (y) but upon this it has been remarked, that perhaps it had been better expressed to have said, that inasmuch as they acted not so much with a view to keep the peace, as in the nature of partisans to the different parties, they acted altogether out of the scope of their characters as peace officers, and without any authority whatever. (z) And in another case, Lord Hale says, that if the sheriff have a writ of possession against the house and lands of A., and A., pretending it to be a riot upon him, gain the constable of the vill to assist him, and to suppress the sheriff or his bailiffs, and in the conflict the constable be killed, this is not so much as manslaughter; but if any of the sheriff's officers were killed, it would be murder, because the constable had no authority to encounter the sheriff's proceeding when acting by virtue of the King's writ. (a)

There is a late case, which appears to have been ruled upon the foregoing principles. Some sheriff's officers having apprehended a man by virtue of a writ against him, a mob collected and endeavoured by violence to rescue the prisoner. In the course of the scuffle, which was at ten o'clock at night, one of the bailiffs having been violently assaulted, struck one of the assailants, a woman, and, as it was thought for some time, had killed her: whereupon, and before her recovery was ascertained, the constable was sent for, and charged with the custody of the bailiff who had struck the woman. The bailiffs, on the other hand, gave the constable notice of their authority, and represented the violence which had been previously offered to them; notwithstanding which, he proceeded to take them into custody upon the charge of murder; and at first, offered to take care also of their prisoner, but the latter was soon rescued from them by the surrounding mob. The woman having recovered, the bailiffs were released by the constable the next morning. Upon an indictment for an assault and rescue, Heath, J., was clearly of opinion that the constable and his assistants were guilty of the assault and rescue, and directed the jury accordingly. (b)

Where private persons interpose in the case of sudden affrays to part the combatants, and prevent mischief, and give express notice of their friendly intent, it will be murder in either of the persons making the affray, who shall kill the party so interposing: but it will not be murder in the other affrayer, unless he also strike the party. (c)

Private persons interposing in sudden affrays.

Some late statutes (d) give authority not only to constables but also to private persons to apprehend persons 'found committing' certain offences specified in such statutes; in these cases it is requisite that the authority to apprehend should be strictly pursued. Thus where upon an indictment for maliciously cutting a farmer's servant, it appeared that the farmer had directed the servant to apprehend the prisoner for stealing turnips, and the servant very soon after this found the prisoner in a field adjoining his master's turnip field, with a quantity of turnips in his possession, and took him into custody, and proceeded with him first to his master's house, and thence to the house of the constable; but on their way there the prisoner said he would go no farther, and drew a knife and wounded the servant: it was contended that the servant had a right to apprehend the prisoner under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 63; but it was held that by that section the owner of the property or his servants were only empowered to apprehend persons 'found committing' offences against the Act, and to take them 'forthwith' before a justice of the peace. That in this case the prisoner was not found committing the offence, but was in the next field; which brought the case neither within the letter nor the spirit of the enactment. Again, by this enactment, the owner or servant who apprehends must take the offender forthwith before a justice. Now the prisoner was actually taken to the master's, and was about to be taken to the constable's, all which was clearly wrong. (e)

As to the apprehension of persons found committing offences under particular statutes. The authority must be strictly pursued.

So where on an indictment for the murder of a person, who was assisting a policeman to take a prisoner to the station-house, it appeared that the policeman apprehended the prisoner at night, and that he had concealed on his person new potatoes, fresh dug out of the ground, and with moist earth upon them, and which did not appear to have been dug out of the ground more than half an hour, and the policeman stated that he had been informed that gardens had been robbed, and that he apprehended the man on suspicion of stealing the potatoes out of a garden: but there was no evidence either to show that any garden had been robbed, or that the prisoner had been in or near any garden; it was objected that the policeman had no authority to apprehend the prisoner; for at common law stealing growing potatoes out of a garden was neither a felony nor misdemeanor, and therefore a policeman had no right at common law to apprehend for it; and under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 63, an offender could only be apprehended if he were 'found committing' the offence, and the preceding case was relied upon; it was held that the objection was valid, and consequently that the case was one of manslaughter only. (f)

The party must be apprehended either committing the offence, or upon immediate and fresh pursuit.

But the words 'found committing' must not be taken so strictly as to defeat the reasonable operation of such clauses. The plaintiff, a pedlar, went to the house of Mr. B. and a small dog of Mr. B.'s ran out at the plaintiff, who with a stick gave the dog a blow, which knocked out one of its eyes. The plaintiff then went away, and Mrs. B. immediately sent a boy to fetch a constable, the boy returned with the constable, and Mrs. B. directed them to go after the plaintiff and apprehend him for the injury done to the dog. They went in pursuit of the plaintiff, and found him at a public-house about a mile from Mr. B.'s, and the constable apprehended him and took him before a magistrate. Tindal, C. J. (in summing up): the jury will have to consider, first, whether the plaintiff had committed a wilful injury to the dog; and secondly, whether he was found committing that offence and immediately apprehended: 'with respect to the second question, the words of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, certainly differ materially from those in the 1 Geo. 4, c. 56, and were obviously meant to restrict the powers given by that Act. The object of the Legislature seems to have been to allow the immediate apprehension of a party taken in the commission of a crime of this nature, because otherwise such offences would frequently be committed by persons passing through or having no fixed domicile in the place, and they would therefore entirely escape, if the party injured were obliged to wait for the formalities of a charge before a magistrate, or a warrant. Where the offender is fixed in the country, so that he can be found and apprehended at a subsequent time, there is no reason why that apprehension should not be after a regular proceeding; and the statute therefore differs from the 1 Geo. 4, c. 56, and does not allow a stale apprehension on an old charge, without a warrant. Still the words of the present statute must not be taken so strictly as to defeat its reasonable operation. Suppose a party seen in (f) Reg. v. Phelps, C. & M. 180; and MSS. C. S. G. Neither in this case nor in Rex v. Curran, was the party seen in the act of committing the offence; but it seems that if the party be seen in the commission of the offence by one person, he may be apprehended by another who did not see him in the commission of the offence. See Rex v. Howarth, infra, p. 816, note (k), and Hanway v. Bonville, infra, note (g). Ballinger v. Ferris, 1 M. & W. 618; Reed v. Cowmadow, 6 A.D. & E. 661, 7 C. & P. 821; and Beechey v. Sales, 9 B. & C. 806, cases of actions for illegal apprehension under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, may also be referred to. C. S. G.

the act of committing the crime were to run away, and immediate and fresh pursuit to be made: I think that would be sufficient. So, in this case, the party is actually seen in the commission of the act complained of: as soon as possible an officer is sent for, and he is taken as soon as possible. No greater diligence could be required; and that being the case, I think it must be treated as an "immediate apprehension" for an offence which the plaintiff, supposing under the circumstances that it was an offence at all, was "found committing." (g)

Where a policeman found the prisoner in a garden at night, stooping down close to the ground, and the prisoner jumped up and ran away, and the policeman ran after him and caught him; and it appeared that the prisoner was cutting or plucking some picketees and carnations in the garden, and the jury found that the prisoner had wilfully and maliciously plucked and cut flowers from plants or roots in the garden with intent to steal them, and that he was found by the policeman committing that offence, but that the policeman did not inform the prisoner by word of mouth that he belonged to the police force; it was held, on a case reserved, that the policeman had authority to apprehend the prisoner. (h)

A person may be apprehended without a warrant under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 6, as a person found in a dwelling house, &c., with intent to commit a felony, if he is seen in a dwelling house, &c. but gets out of it and is taken on fresh pursuit, and it makes no difference that he was not seen getting out of the house, and was found concealing himself to prevent being apprehended upon other premises near. To make such an arrest legal it is not necessary that the person should have at the time he is apprehended a continuing purpose to commit the felony; he may be apprehended though that purpose is wholly ended. Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that near midnight two men were seen near a board-house belonging to Oxley; on two persons going up to the board-house, they heard a noise there, and they found the door of the board-house half open, and saw the prisoner inside the board-house and heard a noise among the boards, and the prisoner said 'bring the board;' the two persons then went to Oxley's house to call him up; one of them then went to the bottom of the road, which was about one hundred yards from the board-house, and in a quarter of an hour Oxley came up, with a carving knife in his hand, and having also got another person to assist him, they went to the board-house, the door of which was then closed; the hasp was over the staple, and the padlock was in the staple, but not locked; nobody was in the board-house; they went in, and Oxley found two planks removed from the place, where he had seen them four days before, to another part of the board-house, nearer the door; they then went on from the board-house, and after searching in several places, found the prisoner in the garden of another person, crouched down under a tree, and with a drawn sword in his hand; the prisoner was asked twice what he did there, he made no answer, and then he started off; one of the witnesses ran and caught hold of him, but the prisoner compelled him to leave hold of him; the prisoner fell over something, and then the other witnesses came up; the prisoner struck Oxley on the side with his sword, but did not cut him; then the prisoner again attempted to get away, but was prevented by some pailing; the prisoner then turned round and struck Oxley with his sword, cut through Oxley's hat into his head, and produced a slight wound on his head; up to that time Oxley had not struck the prisoner any blow; the jury negatived the felony in removing the boards from one part of the board-house to another; and it was objected that the prosecutor had no right to apprehend either at common law or under the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 6); for at common law the power to arrest for offences inferior to felony was confined to the time of committing the offence, and it was the same under the Vagrant Act; that the prisoner was not found by the prosecutor committing the offence, but, on the contrary, had ceased from the attempt and abandoned the intention, which distinguished this case from Rex v. Hunt; (i) but the Judges, on a case reserved, held that he might lawfully be apprehended, for as he was seen in the board-house, and was taken on fresh pursuit before he had left the neighbourhood, it was the same as if he had been taken in the outhouse, or in running away from it. (k)

If several hours elapse after the offence is committed, a constable cannot apprehend, although he saw the offence committed.

But if several hours elapse between the time when the offence is committed and the apprehension, the apprehension is not warranted by the Vagrant Act, although the constable who apprehends saw the party committing the offence. Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that the prisoner, with several other persons, were found by Jones, a constable, playing at thimblery and betting with the people at a fair, between two and four o'clock in the afternoon. Jones having received verbal instructions from the magistrates to apprehend such offenders, tried, with the assistance of another person, to apprehend the prisoner and his companions, and succeeded in taking one, but the prisoner and two others of his company fell upon Jones, rescued their companion, and got away themselves.

(k) Rex v. Howarth, R. & M. C. C. R. 207. Rex v. Hunt was relied upon as showing a right to apprehend at common law, independently of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 6, which enacts, 'that it shall be lawful for any person whatsoever to apprehend any person who shall be found offending against this Act;' and by sec. 4, 'every person being found in or upon any dwelling-house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outhouse, or in any inclosed yard, garden, or area, for any unlawful purpose, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond.' In the prisoner's house, on the following day, were found some oak boards of Oxley's, which had been seen in the board-house four days before; but Littledale, J., told the jury, that he thought they could not take into consideration any felony committed in respect of them, as they had been taken at a time previous to the night in question, and it was not for that transaction that the prisoner was endeavoured to be apprehended. It was contended for the prisoner that the arms in the hands of Oxley were such as justified the prisoner in what he did, but the learned Judge did not think that they did, and did not draw the attention of the jury to them. See the remarks of Lord Denman, C. J., in Baynes v. Brewster, 2 Q. B. 375, on this case.

About nine o'clock in the evening Jones not having been able to find the prisoner before, saw him with several of his companions in a public-house, and said to him, 'you are my prisoner.' The prisoner asked 'for what?' and Jones replied, for what he had been doing in the fair; the prisoner resisted, and a scuffle ensued; the prisoner escaped and concealed himself in a privy in the garden. Jones called another constable to his assistance, and they together broke open the privy door and endeavoured to take the prisoner, upon which he took a knife out of his pocket and stabbed the other constable. The jury found that the prisoner knew that the constable was endeavouring to take him for the offence (against the Vagrant Act) committed at the fair; and upon a case reserved, the Judges held that the attempt to apprehend was not lawful under the Vagrant Act, as it was not made on fresh pursuit. Where on an indictment for wounding with intent to disable, it appeared that the prosecutor was a sergeant of police and the prisoner a constable under him, and that the prosecutor went, as it was his duty, to the house of the prisoner to see that he was correct in the discharge of his duty, and the prisoner had some altercation with him, and the prosecutor left the house, the prisoner followed and struck him, and fell when attempting to strike him a second time, and the prosecutor then went away for assistance, and returned to the prisoner's house with two police constables, when the prisoner was not at home: they returned again in two hours and saw him, and the prosecutor told him that he must go with him to the station; the prisoner said he would not stir an inch that night; the prosecutor attempted to take hold of him, whereupon the prisoner inflicted a severe wound upon him; and the jury found him guilty of wounding with intent to prevent his apprehension. It was held, upon a case reserved, that the apprehension was not lawful; for the assault was committed at another time, and there was no probability of its being renewed. (m)

Walker's case.

Under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2, (n) a keeper may apprehend poachers, though there are three or more found armed; for though sec. 2 only authorizes apprehending for offences under sec. 1, yet the offences punishable under sec. 9 are also offences under sec. 1; and if the keeper be killed in the attempt to apprehend, the offender will be guilty of murder, though the keeper had previously struck the offender or one of his party, if he struck in self-defence only, and to diminish the violence illegally used against him, and not vindictively to punish. Upon an indictment for maliciously shooting, it appeared that the prisoner and twenty-one other persons were found armed with long poles and guns in a coppice, which belonged to Mr. P., in the night, by the keepers of Mr. P. and four of his men: they came up to the keepers, who warned them off; they asked the keepers whether they meant to take them, for that they could shoot as well as the keepers; one of the keepers said, that the first man that broke the peace he would shoot, and one of the keeper's men said he would do the best he could towards taking them; the prisoner and his party then turned to go away, and walked between four and five hundred yards over some fields of Mr. P.'s, turning once upon the keeper and his men, and then got over the hedge into a turnpike road: the keeper and his men followed them pretty closely all the way, and got over the hedge after them; the prisoner and his party then formed three deep upon the road, and said the keepers should not go any farther; the keeper again repeated that the first man that broke the peace he would shoot; the prisoner and his party rushed upon the keeper and his men, and some others who had joined them; one of the prisoner's party struck the keeper on the head with a pole, and the keeper knocked him down; another man struck at the keeper with another pole, and the keeper parried off the pole, and knocked him down; one of the prisoner's party fired a gun, which wounded one of the keeper's men; another man then struck the keeper on the head, and the keeper knocked him down, immediately after which one of the prisoner's party fired the shot in question, which wounded the prosecutor. It was insisted on the part of the prisoner that the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2, gave a power of apprehending for offences within the first clause only, and that the offence was an offence upon sec. 9, and not upon sec. 1; but Bayley, B., thought that the offence was an offence within the first section: it was further insisted that, as the keeper had knocked down three of the men before the shot in question was fired, it would not have been murder if death had ensued; but Bayley, B., was of opinion that, if the keeper struck not vindictively, or by way of punishment, or for the purpose of offence, but in self-defence only, and to diminish the violence which was illegally brought into operation against him, it would have been murder had death ensued: and he told the jury that he thought the keeper and his men, even if they had no right to apprehend, had full right to follow the prisoner and his party, in order to discover who they were, and that the prisoner and his party were not warranted in attempting to prevent them; and that if they had attempted to apprehend them, which however they did not, they would have been warranted by the statute in so doing: and the learned Baron left it to the jury whether the keeper did more than was necessary for his own defence, and to diminish the violence and force which was illegally brought against him, as well as the questions of intent: the jury found the prisoner guilty with intent to prevent the lawful apprehension of himself and others, and for that purpose to do grievous bodily harm; and upon a case reserved, the Judges unanimously held that the keeper had power to apprehend, inasmuch as the prisoner was guilty of an offence under the first section as well as the ninth; and notwithstanding the blows given by the keeper, that it would have been murder had the keeper's man died. mitted, but also 'in case of pursuit being made in any other place to which the offender may have escaped.' See the section, ante, p. 642. See Rex v. Payne, R. & M. C. C. R. 378, post, p. 836.

met with violence, and in opposition to such violence, and in self-defence, strike the poacher, and then is killed by the poacher, it is murder. Upon a similar indictment, it appeared that some keepers found the prisoners and from six to nine men more shooting in a wood at night: the prisoners and their party immediately attacked the keeper and his party with the butt ends of their guns, and knocked one of his men down, and struck the keeper many blows, but there was no blow that broke the skin and made a wound until after the keeper had knocked down one of the opposing party. Bayley, B., left this case to the jury, as he did the preceding one, and they found the prisoners guilty with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and at the same meeting as the last case this was also considered, and the Judges affirmed the conviction on the same ground as in the preceding case. merely strikes in self-defence is murder.

If a poacher be found committing an offence upon a manor, and being pursued run off the manor, and then return on it again, he may be apprehended under sec. 2. Upon an indictment for attempting to discharge loaded arms with intent to murder, it appeared that the prosecutor found the prisoner and two others by night in a wood in a manor belonging to Lord C.; he pursued them out of that wood into a field not within the manor, and of which Lord C. was neither the owner nor the occupier; and that being hard pressed, the prisoner returned back into Lord C.'s manor; and being still pursued, he levelled his gun and snapped it at the prosecutor; it was objected that the authority to apprehend ceased the moment that the prisoner was out of Lord C.'s manor; but it was held, that as the prisoner returned again upon the manor it was the same as if he had never been off the manor. (q)

A poacher found committing an offence on a manor, who runs off and again returns on the manor, may be apprehended under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2.

It was held in the same case that a person, who was not a regularly appointed gamekeeper, but who was employed as a watcher to watch for poachers, had authority to apprehend poachers, and that it was not necessary that he should have any written authority. (r)

Watchers.

In order to justify the apprehension of a person for night poaching, it must be proved that he was in pursuit of game between the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and the beginning of the last hour before sunrise. Upon an indictment for maliciously shooting, it appeared that the prosecutor on the 17th of December heard a shot fired in a plantation, and saw the prisoner there; he dropped a hen pheasant; the prosecutor went towards him, and he fired at the prosecutor; the prosecutor was not sure that it was before eight o'clock in the morning that this occurred; it was objected that, as the prisoner was not shown to have been in pursuit of game an hour before sunrise, the prosecutor had no right to apprehend him, and the objection was allowed. (s)

which belongs to his master, or is within his master's manor. (t) If, therefore, a keeper endeavour to apprehend a poacher in a place where he is not authorized by that statute, and the poacher kill him in order to prevent his apprehension, it is only manslaughter. Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that a party of poachers were in a wood by night in pursuit of game; and that the deceased, who was an assistant gamekeeper of Mr. Clive, and others pursued them, and tried to apprehend them: upon which one of the poachers turned round and shot the deceased: the wood was neither the property nor in the occupation of Mr. Clive, nor was it within any manor that belonged to him, Mr. Clive only having the permission of the owner to preserve game there: it was held that the deceased had no authority to apprehend the poachers in the wood, and consequently that the shooting of the keeper was only manslaughter. (u) So where a servant of Sir T. W. found poachers by night in a covert of Colonel C.: they ran away and he pursued them, and was then shot by one of them in the side. Parke, B., said: 'This was not on Sir T. W.'s land. If a person who was out poaching saw a man running after him, he might fairly presume that the person meant to apprehend him; and if the person had no authority to do so, he would not be guilty of murder in using the gun he had in his hand.' 'Unless the prosecutor had authority from Colonel C. to arrest poachers, it would only have been manslaughter if death had ensued: he was attempting an illegal arrest, and the pursuit was a sufficient attempt: he was not the servant of Colonel C., but of Sir T. W.: if Sir T. W. was lord of a manor, including his own land and Colonel C.'s, he might be justified in apprehending.' (v) But in any case, where three or more poachers are out by night within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9, any person may now apprehend the offenders by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11. (w)

But anyone may now do so.

An interference by keepers with poachers not found on their master's manor, without any attempt to apprehend, will not reduce a malicious killing to manslaughter.

But the interference by a gamekeeper with persons found armed in the pursuit of game by night on the lands of an adjoining proprietor, without any attempt forcibly to apprehend, is not a sufficient provocation to reduce a malicious wounding and killing to manslaughter. The prosecutor, being out on duty at night as gamekeeper with his assistant on his master's manor, heard shots towards a wood not belonging to his master, and shortly afterwards saw the prisoners coming along a road in the direction from the wood; the prisoners were armed with a gun, gun-barrel, and bludgeons; they stopped when they saw the prosecutor and his assistant; the prosecutor and his assistant advanced towards the prisoners, when the prosecutor said, 'So, you have been knocking them down; you are a pretty set of people to be out so late at night;' they were then about three yards off; the prosecutor said to his assistant, sufficiently loud for the prisoners to hear, 'Mind him with the gun;' the assistant took hold of the gun gently, one hand on the stock the other on the barrel, and took off the cap gently: there was no struggle; the man did not seem angry at the assistant's holding the gun; the prosecutor saw one of the prisoners, and advanced to look at the faces of the other two, but they bounced off. The prosecutor then turned back towards his assistant and the man who had the gun, and called out as loud as he could, 'Forward, Giggles.' Giggles was the keeper of the manor in which the wood was situate, but he was not there. Three of the men ran in upon the prosecutor, knocked him down, and stunned him; when he recovered himself he saw all the men coming by him, and one said, 'Damn 'em, we have done 'em both;'; they had got two or three paces beyond him, and one of them turned back and struck the prosecutor a violent blow on the left leg with what he thought was a stick, which wounded him in the leg; the prosecutor had committed no assault on either of the four men. The assistant took hold of the gun to prevent the man's running away, but did not tell him so; he took hold of it to let the keeper see if he knew the men; the manor, in which the wood was, extended more than 200 yards beyond where the prisoners were seen; it was objected that the prisoners were on the high road, and the prosecutor and his assistant had no right to obstruct them; but the jury having found the prisoners guilty, the Judges, upon a case reserved, held the conviction right. (x)

Where on an indictment for assaulting J. Smith it appeared that the prisoner got into an empty third-class carriage proceeding from Manchester to Stoke-upon-Trent, and got out on the wrong side at North Road Station, and being asked by the guard for his ticket, he said he had none, and had intended to get out at the station for Crewe Junction. No other demand was made on the prisoner; but the guard ordered him to get into a second-class carriage, and locked the doors. The train then proceeded to Stoke, a distance of several miles. The prisoner, on getting out, was asked for his ticket; and on his not producing it, the second-class fare from Manchester to Stoke was demanded. It not being paid, the policeman at the station collared the prisoner, who gave him a blow and got away. He was pursued and retaken, when he cut the policeman's hand. The reason alleged for bringing the prisoner to Stoke was, that it was the head-quarters of the railway authorities, and there was no mode of dealing with the prisoner at the North Road Station. Wightman, J., told the jury (after stating the facts that occurred at the North Road Station), 'the guard, instead of then taking him on the specific charge of going so far without his ticket, which perhaps he might have done, takes him in a second-class carriage to Stoke, several miles out of the way. A ticket from Manchester to Stoke is there demanded, and afterwards the full fare. It seems to me that this is clearly beyond the law, and that the railway authorities had no right to demand the fare from North Road to Stoke. I do not give any opinion as to the right to convey a person refusing to produce his ticket at one station on to another, on the charge of not paying his fare for that part of the journey which the prisoner

(x) Rex v. Warner, R. & M. C. C. R. 380. S. C. 5 C. & P. 525. It was also objected that the blow on the leg was the act of one alone, and there was no evidence which of the prisoners inflicted it; and as one of the prisoners, before the blow was given, said, 'we've done 'em,' it must be taken that it was supposed both men were dead, and therefore there could be no intent to murder, &c. Bolland, B., told the jury that if they thought the prisoners were acting in concert they were all equally guilty.

had voluntarily and fraudulently performed; but whatever might have been the situation of the parties, if, on demand and refusal of the ticket or fare at North Road, the charge was there made, and he had been conveyed to Stoke for the purpose of dealing with it; here, the arrest being for nonpayment of the fare to Stoke, the apprehension was illegal, and the prisoner had a right to resist it.' (y)

Authority to arrest and imprison in civil suits.

It has been shown that though, even in civil cases, an officer may repel force by force, where his authority to arrest or imprison is resisted, and may do this to the last extremity in cases of reasonable necessity: (z) yet if the party against whom the process has issued fly from the officer endeavouring to arrest him, or if he fly after an arrest actually made, or out of custody, in execution for debt, the officer has no authority to kill him, though he cannot overtake or secure him by any other means. (a)

The authority of an officer, in civil cases, must be regulated and limited by the writ or process which he is empowered to execute, and by the extent of the district in which he is privileged to act. It is only in the character of officer that he can proceed to arrest or imprison, as no private person can of his own authority arrest in civil suits. (b)

Authority to impress seamen.

A press-warrant extends in terms to 'seamen, seafaring men, and others, whose occupations and callings are to work in vessels and boats upon rivers: (c) and persons of this description may be impressed to serve on board his Majesty's ships of war, by those who have proper authority delegated to them for that purpose. (d) A proceeding which has been sometimes considered as hardly consistent with the temper and genius of a free government, but which may be defended on the ground of its necessity for the safety of the state; in order that the government may be enabled, in time of need, thus peremptorily to call for the services of persons who have freely chosen a seafaring life, and whose education and habits have fitted them for the employment.

The delegation of authority to impress is illegal.

But as this is a power of an extraordinary nature, it is highly requisite that no persons should assume it without being duly qualified for that purpose; as the special protection which the law affords to its officers will not be extended to those who venture to act without proper authority. Thus, where the execution of a press-warrant is directed by the terms of the warrant (as is now always the case) not to be intrusted to any person but a commissioned officer, the execution of it by another person will be illegal. As in a case where the lieutenant of a press-gang, to whom the execution of a warrant was properly deputed, remained in King Road, in the port of Bristol, while his boat's crew went some leagues down the channel, by his directions, to press seamen; this was illegal; and when, in the furtherance of that service, one of the press-gang was killed by a mariner in a vessel which they had boarded with intent to press such persons as they could meet with, it was ruled to be only manslaughter, though no personal violence had been offered by the press-gang. (e) And upon the same principles, where the mate of a ship and a party of sailors, without either the captain who had the press-warrant, or the lieutenant who was regularly deputed to execute it, impressed a man, and upon his making some resistance, one of the party struck him a violent blow with a large stick, of which he died some days after, it was adjudged murder. (f) And, in another case, the delegation of the power of impressing by a lieutenant (to whom the warrant had been directed) to a petty officer and several others, to whom he had given verbal orders to impress certain seafaring men, of whom he had received intelligence, was decided to be clearly bad; though it was found to be the constant usage and invariable custom of the navy for all commissioned officers, having in their custody such press-warrants, to give verbal orders to such petty officers whom they might think fit to employ upon the impress service, and that such petty officers usually acted without any other authority than such verbal orders. (g)

If a ship's sentinel shoot a man, because he persists in approaching the ship when he has been ordered not to do so, it will be murder, unless such an act was necessary for the ship's safety. And it will be murder, though the sentinel had orders to prevent the approach of any boats; had ammunition given to him when he was put upon guard; and acted under the mistaken impression that it was his duty. The prisoner was sentinel on board the Achille, when she was paying off. The orders to him from the preceding sentinel were, to keep off all boats, unless they had officers with uniforms in them, or unless the officer on deck allowed them to approach; and he received a musket, three blank cartridges, and three balls. The boats pressed; upon which he called repeatedly to them to keep off; but one of them persisted and came close under the ship; and he then fired at a man who was in the boat, and killed him. It was put to the jury to find, whether the sentinel did not fire under the mistaken impression that it was his duty; and they found that he did. But a case being reserved, the Judges were unanimous that it was, nevertheless, murder. They thought it, however, a proper case for a pardon; and further, they were of opinion, that if the act had been necessary for the preservation of the ship, as if the deceased had been stirring up a mutiny, the sentinel would have been justified. (h)

(l) But it was considered, that if the constable of the vill of A. had a particular precept from a justice of peace directed to him by name, or by his name of office as constable of A., to suppress a riot in the vill of B., or to apprehend a person in the vill of B. for some misdemeanor within the jurisdiction and consuance of the justice of the peace, and in pursuance of that warrant he went to arrest the party in B., and in executing his warrant was killed in B., this amounted to murder. (m) Where a warrant was directed 'to C. S., one of the collectors of the parish of W., the constables of the said parish, and all others his Majesty's officers,' to levy a distress, it was held that the constable of W. had no authority to execute it out of the parish of W.; the rule of law being, that where a warrant is directed to officers, as individuals, or to individuals who are not officers, they may execute it anywhere within the extent of the magistrate's jurisdiction; but where it is directed to men by the name of their office, it is confined to the districts, in which they are officers. (n) But the law as to the latter point was altered by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 18, which was repealed by the 11 & 12 Viet. c. 43, s. 36, but re-enacted by sec. 3 of that Act and the 11 & 12 Viet. c. 42, s. 10, by which warrants to apprehend may be directed either to any constable or other person by name, or generally to the constable of the parish or other district within which the same is to be executed without naming him, or to such constable and all other constables or peace officers in the county or other district within which the justice or justices issuing such warrant has or have jurisdiction, or generally to all the constables or peace officers within such last-mentioned county or district, and such warrant may be executed by apprehending the offender or defendant at any place within the county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, or place within which the justice or justices issuing the same shall have jurisdiction, or in case of fresh pursuit at any place in the next adjoining county or place and within seven miles of the border of such first-mentioned county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough or place, without having such warrant backed; and in all cases where such warrant shall be directed to all constables or other peace officers within the county or other district within which the justice or justices issuing the same shall have jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for any constable, head-borough, tithingman, borseholder or other peace officer for any parish, township, hamlet, or place within such county or district, to execute the said warrant within any parish, township, hamlet, or place situate within the jurisdiction for which such justice or justices shall have acted when he or they granted such warrant, in like manner as if such warrant were directed specially to such constable by name, and notwithstanding the place in which such warrant shall be executed, shall not be within the parish, township, hamlet, or place, for which he shall be such constable, tithingman, borseholder, or other peace officer. Where, since these acts, a search warrant was directed 'to the constable of Dauntsey,' and headed 'Wilts (to wit)'; but, instead of being delivered to that constable, it was delivered to a county police-constable appointed under the 2 & 3 Vict., c. 98, s. 3, who was attached to the district in which Dauntsey was situated, and executed by him in Dauntsey; it was held that the execution of the warrant was illegal, as it could only be executed by a constable of Dauntsey. (p)

The 11 & 12 Vict., c. 42, s. 11, provides for the indorsement of warrants in cases of indictable offences, and enacts that the 'indorsement shall be sufficient authority to the person bringing such warrant, and to all other persons to whom the same was originally directed; and also to all constables and other peace officers of the county or place where such warrant shall be so indorsed to execute the same in such other county or place.' And the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, s. 3, extends this provision to all warrants and commitments issued under that Act. (q)

The 5 Geo. 4, c. 18, did not extend to the warrant of a Judge of the King's Bench, but only to the warrants of persons having authority as justices of the peace within the limited jurisdictions therein expressed, (r) and it is clear the new clauses are not more extensive. It may be observed, that if a warrant be directed to several persons, any of them may execute it. (s)

A warrant must be executed by the party named in it, or by some one assisting such party, and in his presence, either actual or constructive. Upon an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, for maliciously stabbing, it appeared that a constable having a warrant to apprehend the prisoner, gave it to his son, who went in pursuit of the prisoner, in company with his brother; the father stayed behind; the brothers found the prisoner lying under a hedge; and when they came up he had a knife in his hand, running it into the ground; he got up from the ground to run away, one of them laid hold of him, and he stabbed him with the

(t) So where upon a similar indictment, it appeared that a warrant issued by commissioners of bankrupt was directed to 'J. Adams and W. Smith our messengers and their assistants;' and that the prosecutor, who was the assistant of Smith, having obtained the warrant from him, went in pursuit of the prisoner, who, on the prosecutor overtaking him, and saying he had the warrant, wounded the prosecutor with a stone; neither Smith nor Adams being present at the time, nor anywhere near the place, where the attempt to arrest occurred: it was objected that the prosecutor was not authorized by the warrant to arrest the prisoner except in the presence, actual or constructive, of either Adams or Smith, and that the word 'assistants' only extended to persons who went with Adams and Smith to assist in taking the prisoner. Williams, J., said, 'I think it is not sufficient that the prosecutor should have been deputed to act on the warrant by the messenger; and I think also, that to authorize him to act, he must derive his authority direct from the commissioners themselves. It appears to me that the term "assistant" would apply to any person, whom Adams or Smith directed to go in aid of them. It therefore remained uncertain who those assistants might be, till either Smith or Adams had named them; and I think that is not a legal execution of the warrant, unless it be executed in the presence actual or constructive, of either Adams or Smith, who are named in it.' Galliard's case.

Where a warrant to arrest one Galliard for disobedience to a bastardy order was directed 'to the constable of the township of Nantwich, in the county of Chester, and all her Majesty's officers of the peace in and for the said county,' and was given to the superintendent of police, and by him given to the police at Coppenhall, and it had been for a time in the possession of police-constable Dyson, and he and Sharman, being on duty in uniform as constables in Coppenhall, arrested Galliard under the warrant, but they had not the warrant in their possession at the time, it being at the station-house at Coppenhall, in the possession of their superior officer; it was held that this arrest was illegal, as the officers were bound to have the warrant ready to be produced, if required. (v)

In the preceding case, as no point seemed to have been raised upon any omission of the police to inform Galliard of the nature of the charge, the Court said, 'It may be presumed that they did tell him, not only that they arrested him under the warrant, but what the charge was. As they were obviously police-constables, we think that they were not bound in the first instance to produce the warrant at the time they made the arrest; but that, as this was not the charge of a felony, but rather in the nature of a civil than of a criminal proceeding, the warrant ought to have been produced,

The prisoner was indicted for maliciously wounding the prosecutor with intent to resist his apprehension for assaulting one W. P. The prosecutor having received a warrant, wherein he was commanded 'to apprehend the prisoner and to bring him before me to answer unto the said complaint (assaulting W. P.) and to be further dealt with according to law,' went in search of the prisoner, and brought him before the magistrate, who granted the warrant, and another magistrate; he was ordered to find bail; he said he would not; upon which he was ordered to be committed; whilst the commitment was making out he made his escape; the prosecutor was ordered to go after him; there was no authority in writing; but in consequence of the verbal directions of the magistrates to the clerk, who was making out the commitment, the latter ordered the prosecutor to go after the prisoner; the prosecutor accordingly did so, and in attempting to apprehend the prisoner was cut by him with a knife; it was objected on the part of the prisoner that the count was not proved, for that the party having been taken before the magistrates, the warrant was functus officio; and the second taking was for having made his escape from the office; sensually, that the count was bad, as it did not follow that the assaulting W. P. was an offence for which the prisoner was liable to be apprehended; but Gascoke, J., thought the warrant continued in force, and that the second objection was upon the face of the record; and the jury having found the prisoner guilty, upon a case reserved, the conviction was held good. Where an officer endeavouring to execute process is resisted and killed, the crime will not amount to murder, unless the process is legal; but by this is to be understood only that the process, whether by writ or warrant, must not be defective in the frame of it, and must issue in the ordinary course of justice from a Court or magistrate having jurisdiction in the case. (y) Therefore, though there may have been error or irregularity in the proceeding previous to the issuing of the process, it will be murder if the sheriff or other officer should be killed in the execution of it; for the officer to whom it is directed must, at his peril, pay obedience to it. (z) And for this reason, if a capias ad satisfaciendum, fieri facias, writ of assistance, or any other writ of the like kind issue, directed to the sheriff, and he or any of his officers be killed in the execution of it, it is sufficient, upon an indictment for this murder, to produce the writ and warrant, without showing the judgment or decree. warrant to the bailiff, must be produced. (b) So where upon an indictment for assaulting J. Evans in the execution of his office of sub-bailiff of a County Court, it appeared that the prisoner was arrested by Evans under a warrant, which was in the form authorized by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 61, for not having satisfied a judgment and costs; but the previous proceedings authorizing the warrant were not proved; on a case reserved, it was held that these proceedings need not be proved: for the process of the County Court was as much a justification to the officer by virtue of the Act, as is a writ of execution out of a superior Court to a sheriff, and it is clear that the production of such a writ would be sufficient in a proceeding of this description for assaulting the sheriff or a bailiff without proof of the judgment. (c) So, where the defendants were indicted for an assault, and it appeared that Messrs. Jones and Oakes, ironmasters, became bankrupts, and Bolle, a messenger of the District Court of Bankruptcy, in consequence of information that certain ironstone belonging to the bankrupts was lying in a boat, obtained a warrant from two justices to search for the property of Jones and Oakes, and went with this warrant to search the boat, whereupon the assault was committed. It was submitted that the bankruptcy and the proceedings under it must be proved; but Erle, J., held that the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 29, (d) rendered it unnecessary to show the validity of the proceedings prior to obtaining the magistrate's warrant. (e) So, though the warrant of a justice of peace be not in strictness lawful, as if it do not express the cause with sufficient particularity; yet, if the matter be within his jurisdiction, the killing of the officer executing the warrant will be murder; for it is not in the power of the officer to dispute the validity of the warrant, if it be under the seal of the justice. (f) It may be observed also, that in all kinds of process, both civil and criminal, the falsity of the charge contained in such process will afford no matter of alleviation for killing the officer: for every man is bound to submit himself to the regular course of justice: (g) and therefore, in the case of an escape warrant, the person executing it was held to be under the special protection of the law, though the warrant had been obtained by gross imposition on the magistrate, and by false information as to the matters suggested in it. (h) So where a borough rate is good on the face of it, a distress warrant issued upon it is valid, although the rate may have been made in part for by-gone expenses. (i)

But if the process be defective in the frame of it, as if there be a mistake in the name or addition of the person on whom it is to be executed; or if the name of the officer or the party be inserted without authority, and after the issuing of the process, and the officer endeavouring to execute it be killed, this will amount to no more than manslaughter in the person whose liberty is so invaded. (l)

Process defective in the frame of it.

Every warrant ought to specify the offence charged; the authority under which the arrest is to be made; the person who is to execute it; and the person to be arrested. (m) A warrant, therefore, leaving a blank for the Christian name of the person to be apprehended, and giving no reason for the omission, but describing him only as —H., the son of S. H., and stating the charge to be for assaulting A. B. in the execution of his duty, without particularizing the time, place, or any other circumstances of the assault, is too general and unspecific, and therefore a resistance to an arrest thereon, and killing the person attempting to execute it, will not be murder. Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that George Hood having assaulted Brown, a sheriff's officer, who was endeavouring to arrest his father, Samuel Hood, under a capias ad respondendum, Brown applied to a magistrate for a warrant to apprehend George Hood for an assault, but not being at that time acquainted with his Christian name, the warrant, so far as it related to the name and description of the person committing the assault, was in the following terms, viz., 'to take the body of — Hood (leaving a blank for the Christian name) of, &c., by whatsoever name he may be called or known, the son of Samuel Hood, to answer, &c., on the oath of Francis Brown, an officer of the sheriff of the county of Wilts, for assaulting him in the execution of his duty.' This warrant was delivered to the tithing-man to execute, and he went to S. Hood's house, with Brown and others, to execute it; and Brown pointed out G. Hood to the tithing-man as the person on whom the warrant was to be executed, and upon attempting to apprehend him, he stabbed a person whom the tithing-man had charged to aid and assist. S. Hood had four sons who resided with him. It was objected that as the Christian name of George Hood was omitted, the warrant was illegal, and would not authorize his apprehension; and, upon a case reserved, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the warrant was bad, because it omitted the Christian name; it should have assigned some reason for the omission, and have given some particulars of

The essence of a warrant is to describe the party to be taken, so that the officer may know whom he is to take, and the party may know whether he is bound to submit to the arrest.

It is of the essence of a warrant that it should be so framed that the officer should know whom he is to take, and that the party upon whom it is executed should know whether he is bound to submit to the arrest. If, therefore, a constable, having a warrant directing him to apprehend A. B., arrest C. B. under the warrant, such arrest is illegal, although C. B. were the person against whom the magistrate intended to issue the warrant, and although the person who made the charge before the magistrate pointed out C. B. as the man against whom the warrant was issued. A magistrate for the county of Herts issued his warrant, directing a constable to take John H., charged with stealing a mare. Armed with this warrant, the constable went to Smithfield, and there arrested Richard H., who was the party against whom information had been given, and against whom the magistrate intended to issue his warrant, and who was supposed to be called John H.; his name, however, was really Richard H., John H. being the name of his father. There was no proof that a felony had been committed. The person who made the charge before the magistrate pointed out Richard H. as the man who had stolen the mare, and a person present said that his name was John H., and there was clearly evidence to go to the jury that Richard H. was the man intended to be taken up. Coltman, J., told the jury that the law would not justify the constable's act, the warrant being against John and not against Richard, although Richard was the party intended to be taken; that a person cannot be lawfully taken under a warrant in which he is described by a name that does not belong to him, unless he has called himself by the wrong name; that a constable may, in many cases, take up a person on a charge of felony by virtue of his office of constable, and without any warrant from a magistrate; but that he can only do so within the district for which he is chosen constable. The jury having found a verdict against the constable, the Court held that the direction was right. That in civil process, the taking a person by the name mentioned in a warrant, his real name being different, cannot be justified, and that no distinction could be made between civil and criminal process. In either case, the object of the warrant is to identify the party intended to be arrested. (o)

(n) Rex v. Hood, R. & M. C. C. R. 281. See per Tindal, C. J., in Hoye v. Bush, infra, note (o). The decision seems to have proceeded on the omission of the Christian name alone, but the marginal note adverts to the insufficiency of the statement of the offence for which the warrant was granted, and it seems that the warrant was bad on that ground also, as it did not state where the assault was committed, and therefore did not show that it was within the jurisdiction of the magistrate who granted the warrant. C. S. G. See the observations of Coleridge, J. Howard v. Gossett, 10 Q. B. 387, et seq.

(o) Hoye v. Bush, 1 M. & Gr. 775. As there was no authority to apprehend Richard H. under the warrant, and the constable was out of his district, he was in the same situation as a private individual, and therefore could only have defended himself by proving that a felony had been committed by Richard H. See ante, p. 735, and per Tindal, C. J., 1 M. & Gr. 780. 'If he were the guilty person, the officer would not want the warrant, supposing a felony to have been committed.' If the constable had been within his district the facts of this case seem to have been sufficient to have justified his apprehending Richard H.; as in such a case, although no felony had been committed, yet if there were reasonable ground to suspect Richard H. of having committed a felony, that would justify the constable in apprehending him. See Beckwith v. Philby, 6 B. & C. 638, ante,

Where a warrant commanded the constable to apprehend a prisoner, and bring him before a justice 'to answer to all such matters and things as on Her Majesty's behalf shall be objected against him on oath by M. A. W. for an assault committed on her;' it was held bad, for it did not state any information on oath that any assault had been committed. (p) And where a warrant of a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench directed certain officers to apprehend a person 'and him safely keep, to the end that he may become bound and find sufficient sureties to answer' an indictment for a conspiracy, 'and to be further dealt with according to law;' it was held that the warrant was bad for not directing that the party should be taken before some Judge or justice for the purpose of finding sureties. Judge's warrant.

Where a warrant to distrain for a borough rate was signed and sealed by two justices, and delivered to the town clerk for the purpose of having the corporate seal affixed thereto, and he altered the date of it from the 10th to the 14th of August, with the assent and direction of the justices, and the same was afterwards resigned and re-sealed, and the corporate seal affixed thereto, it was held that the warrant was good; for the date was altered whilst it was in the possession of the justices before it was issued, and they were clearly at liberty to alter it at that time. (r) Where in the body of a warrant of distress the justices were described as 'two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough and city, and one of us being the mayor of the said borough and city,' and the warrant was signed by the two; it was objected that it did not appear in the body of the warrant that one of them was mayor at the time the warrant issued; but the objection was overruled; for there was no authority for saying that the signature might not be looked at and considered as part of the warrant. (s) It was objected on error, that as under the signatures were the words 'justices of the said city and borough,' the warrant was signed by the mayor as a justice, and he could not afterwards sign it as mayor; but it was held that he might act in both characters, and that the warrant was not less the warrant of the mayor because it was also that of the justice. (t) Where a distress warrant had in the margin 'Borough and City of Lichfield,' and described the justices as 'justices of the peace for the said city and borough,' it was objected that the warrant did not show that they were acting within their jurisdiction, as it did not use the ordinary words 'in and for;' but it was held that it did appear to have been issued within their jurisdiction; for the venue in the margin might be taken as constituting the place of making the warrant. sold pursuant to the 27 Geo. 3, c. 20, s. 1; but the warrant was held good; for the obvious meaning of that section is to fix the time within which the party distrained on may save his goods by tendering the amount due with the costs, and here the warrant did specify five days as the time allowed for payment, and then the officer is directed to sell. Distinction
warrants of superior and
inferior courts.

There is a grand distinction between the warrants of magistrates and others who act by special statutory authority, and out of the course of the common law, and such warrants as are to be regarded as the mandate of a superior court acting according to the course of the common law. In the case of special authorities given by statute to justices or others acting out of the ordinary course of the common law, the instruments by which they act, whether warrants to arrest, commitments, or orders, or convictions, or inquisitions, ought to show their authority on the face of them by direct averment or reasonable intendment. Not so the process of superior courts acting by the authority of the common law. The rule for jurisdiction is, that nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which specially appears to be so, and nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court but that which is so expressly alleged. (w)

Of the illegality of blank warrants.

Stockley's case.

It appears to have been formerly a very common practice to issue blank warrants, notwithstanding their illegality. The prisoner Stockley, about Lady-day 1753, had been arrested by Welch, the deceased, at the suit of one Bourn, but was rescued; and he afterwards declared, that if Welch offered to arrest him again, he would shoot him. A writ of rescue was made out at the suit of Bourn, and carried to the office of a Mr. Deacle (who acted for the under-sheriff of Staffordshire) to have warrants made out upon such writ. The custom of the under-sheriff was to deliver to Deacle sometimes blank warrants, sometimes blank pieces of paper, under the seal of the office, to be afterwards filled up as occasion required. Deacle made out a warrant against Stockley upon one of these blank pieces of paper, and delivered it to Welch, who inserted therein the names of Thomas Clewes and William Davil, on the 12th of July, 1753. On the 19th of September following, Welch, Davil, Clewes, and one Howard, the person to whom Stockley had declared he would shoot Welch, went to arrest Stockley on this warrant. Clewes and Davil, having the warrant, went into Stockley's house first, and called for refreshment; but, an alarm being given that Welch was coming, the door was locked; upon which Clewes arrested Stockley on this illegal warrant, who thereupon fell upon Clewes, and thrust him out of doors, but kept Davil within, and beat him very dangerously, he crying out murder. On hearing this, Welch and Howard endeavoured to get into the house; and Welch broke open the window, and had got one leg in, when Stockley shot and killed him. Stockley was tried for murder, when the jury expressly found that the deceased attempted to get into the house to assist in the arrest of Stockley. Howard, Clewes, and Davil, being dead, their depositions before the coroner were read, and minutes were taken of the above facts for a special verdict: but, to save expense, the case was referred to the Judges of the King's Bench, who certified that the offence amounted, in point of law, only to manslaughter. (x)

This practice of issuing blank warrants was reprobated in a more recent case, where the sheriff having directed a warrant to A. by name, and all his other officers, the name of another of the sheriff's officers, B., was inserted after the warrant was signed and sealed by the sheriff; and, therefore, an arrest by B. was holden illegal. (y) And in another case it was considered that the arrest was illegal, where the warrant was filled up after it had been sealed. (z) But if the name of the officer be inserted before the warrant is sent out of the sheriff's office, it seems that the arrest will not be illegal, on the ground that the warrant was sealed before the name of the officer was inserted. Banks and Powell had a warrant from the sheriff of Salop upon a writ of possession against the prisoner's house; and their names were interlined after the warrant was sealed, but before it was sent out of the office. The prisoner refused them admittance; and, on their bursting open the door, shot at Banks, and wounded him severely. Upon an indictment for wilfully shooting, upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, objection was taken that the warrant gave Banks and Powell no authority, because their names were inserted after it was sealed. But the prisoner having been convicted, upon a case reserved, the Judges held that the conviction was right. (a) So where a magistrate who kept by him a number of blank warrants ready signed, on being applied to, filled up one of them, and delivered it to the officer, who, in endeavouring to arrest the party, was killed; it was held that this was murder in the person killing the officer. It may be proper to remark a circumstance in the preceding case of Stockley, which has been thought to deserve consideration. (c) namely, that he had before deliberately resolved upon shooting Welch in case he offered to arrest him again, which in all probability it might be his duty to do. It certainly resembles a former case, where, upon some officers breaking open a shop-door to execute an escape warrant, the prisoner, who had previously sworn that the first man that entered should be a dead man, killed one of them immediately by a blow with an axe. A few of the Judges to whom this case was referred, were of opinion that this would have been murder, though the warrant had not been legal, and though the officers could not have justified the breaking open the door, upon the grounds of the brutal cruelty of the act, and of the deliberation manifested by the prisoner, who, looking out of a window with the axe in his hand, had sworn, before any attempt to enter the shop, that the first man that did enter should be a dead man. (d) But in another case, prior to either of these, where the cruelty and the deliberation were of a similar kind, the crime was considered as extenuated by the illegality of the officer's proceeding. A bailiff having a warrant to arrest a person upon a capias ad sat'ficiendum, came to his house, and gave him notice; upon which the person menaced to shoot him if he did not depart: the bailiff did not depart, but broke open the window to make the arrest, and the person shot him, and killed him. It was holden that this was not murder, because the officer had no right to break the house: but that it was manslaughter, because the party knew the officer to be a bailiff. (e)

(e) Cook's case, 1 Hale, 453. Cro. Car. 537, W. Jones, 429. Upon these cases the following very sensible observations are made in Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 707, 708: 'These decisions would appear to countenance the position, that where an officer attempts to execute an illegal warrant, and is in the first instance resisted with such violence by the party that death ensues, it will amount to manslaughter only. But it should seem that in analogy to all other cases of provocation this position requires some qualification. If it be possible for the party resisting to effect his object with a less degree of violence than the infliction of death, a great degree of unnecessary violence might, it is conceived, be evidence of such malice as to prevent the crime from being reduced to manslaughter. In Thompson's case, 1 R. & M. C. C. R. 39, where the officer was about to make an arrest on an insufficient charge, the Judges adverted to the fact that the prisoner was in such a situation that he could not get away. In these cases it would seem to be the duty of the party whose liberty is endangered to resist the officer with as little violence as possible, and that if he uses great and unnecessary violence, unsuited both to the provocation given and to the accomplishment of a successful resistance, it will be evidence of malice sufficient to support a charge of murder. So also where, as in Stockley's case, supra, note (x), and Curtis's case, supra, note (d), the party appears to have acted from motives of express malice, there seems to be no reason for withdrawing such cases from the operation of the general rule, that provocation will not justify the party killing, or prevent his offence from amounting to murder, where it is proved that he acted at the time from express malice. And of this opinion appears to be Mr. East, who says, 'it may be worthy of consideration whether the illegality of an arrest does not place the officer attempting it exactly on the same footing as any other wrong doer.' 1 East, P. C. 328. It may be remarked that this question is fully decided in the Scotch law, the rule being as follows:—In resisting irregular or defective warrants, or warrants executed in an irregular way, or upon the wrong person, it is murder, if death ensue to the officer by the assumption of lethal weapons, where no great personal violence has been sustained. Alison's

Princ. Cr. Law of Scotland, 25. If, says Baron Hume, instead of submitting for the time, and looking for redress to the law, he shall take advantage of the mistake to stab or shoot the officer, when no great struggle has yet ensued, and no protest or form of body has been sustained, certainly he cannot be found guilty of any less crime than murder. 1 Hume, 250. The distinction appears to be, says Mr. Alison, that the Scotch law reproaches the immediate assumption of lethal weapons in resisting an illegal warrant, and will hold it as murder if death ensue by such immediate use of them, the more especially if the informality of error was not known to the party resisting; whereas the English practice makes such allowance for the irritation consequent upon the irregular interference with liberty, that it accounts death inflicted under such circumstances as manslaughter only.' Alison's Princ. Cr. Law of Scotland, 28. In such cases it seems to me that it may be hard observing of consideration whether the first impulse ought not to be whether or not the act done was caused by the illegal apprehension. If the act done arose from other causes, and had no reference to the illegal arrest, as if it arose from previous ill will, it should seem that the illegality of the arrest ought not to be taken into consideration, because it was not the cause of the act, and therefore could not be truly said to have afforded any provocation for it. Such a case would be like the cases where blows have been given by the deceased, but the fatal blow has been inflicted in consequence of previous ill will. (See Rex v. Thomas, ante, p. 720, Reg. v. Kirkham, ante, p. 721.) From the observations of Parke, B. in Rex v. Parkinson, supra, note (f), I infer that the very learned Baron was of opinion that if there were previous malice, the illegal arrest would not reduce the crime to manslaughter; because the previous malice was the cause of the act and not the illegality of the arrest. In such an inquiry the fact that the prisoner was ignorant at the time that the arrest was illegal would be most material, because it would almost conclusively show that the act did not arise from that cause. It should also be observed, that if a man has a legal and illegal warrant, and arrests by virtue of the illegal warrant, yet he may justify by virtue of the legal one; for it is not what he declares, but the authority

Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it appeared that a constable having a warrant to apprehend the prisoner, gave it to his son, who went in pursuit of the prisoner in company with his brother; the father stayed behind; they found the prisoner lying under a hedge, and when they first saw him he had a knife in his hand running the blade of it into the ground; he got up from the ground to run away, and the son laid hold of him, and he stabbed the son with the knife; the father was in sight at about a quarter of a mile off. Parke, B., 'The arrest was illegal, as the father was too far off to be assisting in it; and there is no evidence that the prisoner had prepared the knife beforehand to resist illegal violence. If a person receives illegal violence, and he resists that violence with anything he happens to have in his hand, and death ensues, that would be manslaughter. If the prisoner had taken out this knife on seeing the young man come up, it might be evidence of previous malice, but that is not so, as we find that the knife was in his hand when the young man first came in sight.' Patience's case.

The parties whose liberty is interfered with must have due notice of the officer's business; or their resistance and killing of such officer will amount only to manslaughter. (g) Thus, where a bailiff pushed abruptly and violently into a gentleman's chamber early in the morning, in order to arrest him, but did not tell his business, nor use words of arrest, and the party not knowing that the other was an officer, in the first surprise snatched down a sword, which hung in his room, and killed the bailiff; it was ruled to be manslaughter. (h) But it will be otherwise, if the officer and his business be known; (i) as where a man said to a bailiff who came to arrest him, 'Stand off, I know you well enough, come at your peril,' and, upon the bailiff taking hold of him, ran the bailiff through the body and killed him, it was held to be murder. (k) This will apply as well to a special bailiff as to a known officer; but where the party does not show by his conduct that he is acquainted with the officer and his business, material distinctions arise as to notice of a known officer, and one whose authority is only special.

As to notice of the authority to arrest.

Where a party is apprehended in the commission of an offence, or upon fresh pursuit afterwards, notice is not necessary, because he must know the reason why he is apprehended. Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding it appeared that two persons

Wait*, 1 Ad. & E. 264; so it might be contended that if the party apprehended had committed a felony, as he might be apprehended by any individual without a warrant, the apprehension by a constable under a defective warrant would not be illegal, as he might justify the arrest as a private individual. See per Tindal, C. J., in Hoye v. Bush, 1 M. & Gr. 775, ante, p. 830, note (c). So also as a constable has authority to apprehend any person within his district, whom he has heard a noise in a board-house, near midnight, and saw the prisoner inside the board-house, and heard a noise among the boards, and heard the prisoner say, 'Bring that board:' on which the persons went for the owner, who came in a quarter of an hour, when no one was found in the board-house, but two planks had been removed to a part of the board-house nearer the door, and after searching in several places they found the prisoner in the garden of another person, crouched down under a tree, with a drawn sword in his hand, and being asked twice what he did there, he made no answer, and then started off, but was pursued and caught hold of by one of the persons, whom he compelled to leave his hold; he then fell over something, and the others came up, and he then attempted to get away, but was prevented by some piling, and he then turned round and wounded the owner of the boards; it was held, on a case reserved, that the circumstances of the case told him why he was apprehended, and that it was not necessary to tell him what he must have known. (l) So where upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that the assistant to the head keeper of Sir R. S. went with five or six assistants towards a covert of Sir R. S., where they heard guns; they then went towards the place, and rushed in at the poachers to take them; the prosecutor saw six persons in the wood, and he ran after them; they got into a field about six yards off; they then ranged themselves in a row, the prosecutor being five or six yards from them, on the edge of the plantation, and he heard one of them say, 'The first man that comes out I'll be d——d if I don't shoot him;' upon which the prosecutor drew his pistol, cocked it, and ran out: they all ran away together; the prosecutor followed them, and when they had run about fifty yards they stood; they had all turned round; one of them shot at the prosecutor, who was running to him: the prosecutor was wounded; the men said nothing to the prosecutor before he was shot, nor he to them; it was objected, that, inasmuch as the prosecutor's authority to apprehend them was derived from the act creating the offence, it was incumbent upon him to give notice to them: the objection was overruled: and, upon a case reserved, the Judges were of opinion that the circumstances constituted sufficient notice. (m) So where a servant of Sir T. W. was out with his gamekeeper at night, and they heard two guns fired, and went towards the place, and got into a covert, and saw some men there who ran away, and the servant pursued them, and got close up to one of them, and made a catch at his legs, and was immediately shot through the side; Parke, B., said, 'Where parties find poachers in a wood, they need not give any intimation by words that they are gamekeepers, or that they come to apprehend; the circumstances are sufficient notice. What can a person poaching in a wood suppose when he sees another at his heels?' (n)

case of sudden affrays, in order to part the combatants, and prevent bloodshed, it is quite necessary that they should give express notice of their friendly intent; otherwise the persons engaged may, in the heat and bustle of the affray, imagine that they come to act as parties. (o)

With regard to such ministers of justice as, in right of their offices, are conservators of the peace, and in that right alone interpose in the case of riots and affrays, it is necessary, in order to make the offence of killing them amount to murder, that the parties engaged should have some notice of the intent with which they interpose; for the reason which was mentioned in relation to private persons; lest the parties engaged should, in the heat and bustle of an affray, imagine that they come to take a part in it. (p) But, in these cases, a small matter will amount to a due notification. It is sufficient if the peace be commanded, or the officer, in any other manner, declare with what intent he interposes. Or if the officer be within his proper district, and known, or but generally acknowledged, to bear the office he assumes, the law will presume that the party killing had due notice of his intent; especially if it be in the daytime. (q) In the night some further notification is necessary; and commanding the peace, or using words of the like import, notifying his business, will be sufficient. (r) Killing a watchman in the execution of his office is not the less murder for being done in the night; and the killing of an officer who arrests on civil process may be murder, though the arrest be made in the night; and in the case of an affray in the night where the constable, or any other person who comes to aid him to keep the peace, is killed, after the constable has commanded in the King's name to the keeping of the peace, such killing will be murder; for though the parties could not discern or know him to be a constable, yet if it were said at the time that he was such officer, resistance was at their peril. (s) Therefore though the saying of a learned Judge, 'That a constable's staff will not make a constable,' is admitted to be true; yet if a minister of justice be present at a riot or affray within his district, and in order to keep the peace produce his staff of office, or any other known ensign of authority, in the daytime when it can be seen, it is conceived that this will be a sufficient notification of the intent with which he interposes; and that, if resistance be made after this notification, and he or any of his assistants killed, it will be murder in everyone who joined in such resistance. (t) For it seems, that in the case of a public bailiff, a bailiff juratus et cognitus, acting in his own district, his authority is considered as a matter of notoriety; and, upon this ground, though the warrant by which he was constituted bailiff be demanded, he need not

Because he was constable of the same vill. 2. Because he notified his business at the door before the assault, viz., that show it; (u) and it is sufficient if he notify that he is the constable, and arrest in the King's name. (v) And this kind of notification by implication of law will hold also in cases where public officers, having warrants, directed to them as such, to execute, are resisted, and killed in the attempt. (w) Thus, where a warrant had been granted against the prisoner by a justice of peace for an assault, and directed to the constable of Pattishal, and delivered by the person who had obtained it to the deceased, to execute, as constable of the parish, and it appeared that the deceased went to the prisoner's house in the daytime to execute the warrant, had his constable's staff with him, and gave notice of his business, and further, that he had before acted as constable of the parish, and was generally known as such: it was determined that this was sufficient evidence and notification of the deceased being constable, although there were no proof of his appointment, or of his being sworn into the office. (x)

To what persons in an affray notice extends; and of notice in the case of third persons interposing.

It is laid down in one case, that if, upon an affray, the constable, or others in his assistance, come to suppress it, and preserve the peace, and be killed in executing their office, it is murder in law, although the murderer knew not the party killed, and though the affray were sudden; because he set himself against the justice of the realm. (y) It is said, however, that in order to reconcile this with other authorities, it seems that the party killing must have had implied notice of the character in which the peace officer and his assistants interfered, though not a personal knowledge of them. (z) For it is elsewhere laid down, that if there be a sudden affray, and the constable come in, and, endeavouring to appease it, be killed by one of the company who knew him, it is murder in the party killing, and in such of the others as knew the constable, and abetted the party in the fact; but only manslaughter in those who knew not the constable; (a) and that others continuing in the affray, neither knowing the constable, nor abetting to his death, would not be guilty even of manslaughter. (b) But these positions do not apply to an affray deliberately engaged in by parties determined to make common cause, and to maintain it by force. (c)

It is however agreed, that if a bailiff or other officer be resisted

(u) 1 Hale, 458, 461, 583. Mackally's case, 9 Co. 69 a. But it is otherwise as to the writ or process against the party. Both a public and private bailiff, where the party submits to the arrest and demands it, are bound to show at whose suit, for what cause, and out of what court the process issues, and where returnable. 6 Co. 54 a. 9 Co. 69 a; but it will be no excuse that he did not tell the party, if the party resisted so as not to give time for telling. 9 Co. 69 a. And in no case is the bailiff required to part with the possession of the warrant; neither is a constable, whether acting within or without his jurisdiction. 1 MS. Sum. 250. 1 East, P. in the regular discharge of his duty in executing process against a party, and a third person, even the servant or friend of the party resisting, come in and take part against the officer, and kill him, it will be murder, though he knew him not. (d) But it is suggested, that in this case, in order to make it murder in the servant or friend, the party whom they came in to assist must have had due notice of the officer's authority; and that if the offence would not have been murder in the party himself resisting for want of such notice, neither would it in the servant or friend under the like ignorance. (e) The law upon this point may, perhaps, hardly seem to be reconcileable with that above-mentioned, of a person not knowing the constable, and killing him in an affray; but it is defended on the principle, that every person wilfully engaging, in cool blood, in a breach of the peace, by assaulting another, instead of endeavouring to assuage the dispute, is bound first to satisfy himself of the justice of the cause he espouses at his peril. (f) And, upon this principle, if a stranger seeing two persons engaged, one of them a bailiff, attacking the other, with a sword, and the other resisting an arrest by such bailiff, interfere between them without knowing the bailiff, for the express purpose of defending the party attacked against the bailiff, he must abide the consequences at his peril; but if he interfere, not for the purpose of aiding one party against the other, but with intent only to preserve the peace, and prevent mischief, and in so doing happen to kill the bailiff, the case would possibly fall under a different consideration. (g)

In all cases, whether criminal or civil, where doors may be broken open in order to make an arrest, there must be a previous notification of the business, and a demand to enter on the one hand, and a refusal on the other, before the parties proceed to that extremity. (h) In a case where an outer door had been broken open by two constables and a gamekeeper, to execute a warrant granted under the 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 25, s. 2, to search for, and seize any guns, &c. for destroying game; and it appeared that the door was broken open without the party having been previously requested to open it: the Court held, that, in a case of misdemeanor, a previous demand of admittance was clearly necessary, before an outer door was broken open. Abbot, C. J., said, 'it is not at present necessary to decide how far in a case of a person charged with felony it would be necessary to make a previous demand of admittance, before you could justify breaking open the outer door of the house; because I am clearly of opinion, that, in the case of a misdemeanor, such previous demand is requisite.' criminal process, you must demand admittance, before you can justify breaking open the outer door. That point was mentioned in the judgment of the Court in Bardett v. Abbott.⁽ⁱ⁾ The question as to what should be considered as due notice was much considered in a case where two officers went to the workshop of a person, against whom they had an escape warrant; and finding the shop door shut, called out to the person, and informed him that they had an escape warrant against him, and required him to surrender, otherwise they said they would break open the door; and, upon the person's refusing to surrender, they broke open the door, and one of their assistants was immediately killed. Nine of the Judges were of opinion, that no precise form of words was required in a case of this kind; and that it is sufficient if the party has notice that the officer comes not as a mere trespasser, but claiming to act under a proper authority. The Judges who differed, thought that the officers ought to have declared, in an explicit manner, what sort of warrant they had; and that an escape does not, ex vi termini, nor in the notion of law, imply any degree of force, or breach of the peace; and, consequently, that the prisoner had not due notice that they came under the authority of a warrant grounded on the breach of the peace; and that, for want of this due notice, the officers were not to be considered as acting in discharge of their duty, but as mere trespassers.^(k)

Notice by private bailiff.

In the case of a private or special bailiff, either it must appear that the party knew that he was such officer, as where the party said, 'Stand off, I know you well enough; come at your peril;' or, that there was some such notification thereof that the party might have known it, as by saying, 'I arrest you.' These words, or words to the like effect, give sufficient notice; and if the person using them be a bailiff, and have a warrant, the killing of such officer will be murder.^(l) A private bailiff ought also to show the warrant upon which he acts, if it is demanded;^(m) and with respect to the writ or process against the party, both the public and private bailiff, in case the party submit to the arrest and make the demand, are bound to show at whose suit, and for what cause the arrest is made, out of what court the process issues, and when and where returnable.⁽ⁿ⁾ In no case, however, is he required to part with the warrant out of his own possession; for that is his justification.^(o)

As to the regularity of the proceeding.

It may be observed generally, that where an officer, in executing his office, proceeds irregularly, and exceeds the limits of his authority, the law gives him no protection in that excess; and if he be killed, the offence will amount to no more than manslaughter in the person whose liberty is so invaded.^(p) He should be careful, therefore, to execute process only within the jurisdiction of the court from whence it issues: as, if it be executed out of such jurisdiction, the killing the officer attempting to enforce the execution of it will be only man-slaughter. (q) But, if the process be executed within the jurisdiction of the court or magistrate from whence it is issued, it will be sufficient, though it be executed out of the vill of the constable, provided it be directed to a particular constable by name, or even by his name of office. (r) And the officer must also be careful not to make an arrest on a Sunday, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; as, in all other cases, an arrest on that day will be the same as if done without any authority. (s) But process may be executed in the night time, as well as by day. (t)

The right of officers to break open windows or doors, in order to make an arrest, has been a subject of some litigation; but many of the points have been settled, and require to be shortly noticed. And the general rule must be kept in mind, that in every case, whether criminal or civil, in which doors may be broken open in order to make an arrest, there must be a previous notification of the business, and a demand to enter on the one hand, and a refusal on the other, before the parties proceed to that extremity. (u)

Where a felony has been committed, or a dangerous wound given, the party's house is no sanctuary for him; and the doors may be forced, after the notification, demand, and refusal which have been mentioned. (v) So, where a minister of justice comes armed with process, founded on a breach of the peace, doors may be broken. (w) And it is also settled, upon unquestionable authorities, that where an injury to the public has been committed, in the shape of an insult to any of the courts of justice, on which process of contempt is issued, the officer charged with the execution of such process may break open doors, if necessary, in order to execute it. (x) And the officer may act in the same manner upon a capias utlagatum, or capias pro fine, (y) or upon an habere facias possessionem. (z) The same force may be used where a forcible entry or detainer is found by inquisition before justices of peace, or appears upon their view; (a) and also where the proceeding is upon a warrant of a justice of peace, for levying a penalty on a conviction grounded on any statute, which gives the whole or any part of such penalty to the King. (b) But in this latter case the officer executing the warrant must, if required, show the same to the person whose goods and chattels are distrained, and suffer a copy of it to be taken. (c) suspicion.

But though a felony has been actually committed, yet a bare suspicion of guilt against the party will not authorize a proceeding to this extremity, unless the officer comes armed with a warrant from a magistrate, grounded on such suspicion. (d) For where a person lies under a probable suspicion only, and is not indicted, (e) it is said to be the better opinion, that the breaking open doors without a warrant, in order to apprehend him, cannot be justified; (f) or must at least be considered as done at the peril of proving that the party, so apprehended on suspicion, is guilty. (g) But a different doctrine appears to have formerly prevailed upon this point; by which it was held, that if there were a charge of felony laid before the constable, and reasonable ground of suspicion, such constable might break open doors, though he had no warrant. (h) A plea justifying the entering a house without warrant, the door being open, on suspicion of felony, ought distinctly to show the purpose for which the house was entered, viz., either to search for the stolen property or to arrest the plaintiff, as well as that there was reason to believe that the stolen property or the plaintiff was there. (i) houses.

It is said, that if there be an affray in a house, the doors of which are shut, whereby there is likely to be manslaughter or bloodshed, and the constable demand entrance, and be refused by those within, who continue the affray, the constable may break open the doors to keep the peace, and prevent the danger: (k) and it is also said, that if there be disorderly drinking or noise in a house at an unseasonable time of night, especially in inns, taverns, or ale-houses, the constable or his watch demanding entrance, and being refused, may break open the doors to see and suppress the disorder. (l) And further, that where an affray is made in a house in the view or hearing of a constable, or where those who have made an affray in his presence fly to a house, and are immediately pursued by him, and he is not suffered to enter in order to suppress the affray in the first case, or to apprehend the affrayers in either case, he may justify breaking open the doors. (m)

In civil cases
is his castle.

But this mode of proceeding, by breaking the doors of the party, is founded upon the necessity of the measure for the public weal, and is not permitted to the particular interest of an individual. In civil suits, therefore, the principle that a man's house is his castle, for safety and repose to himself and his family, is admitted; and, accordingly, in such cases, an officer cannot justify the breaking open an outward door or window to execute the process. (n) If he do so, he will be a trespasser; and if the occupier of the house resist him, and in the struggle kill him, the offence will be only manslaughter; (o) for if the occupier of the house do not

It has been considered, however, that this rule of every man's house being his castle has been carried as far as the true principles of political justice will warrant, and that it will not admit of any extension. (q) It should be observed, therefore, that it will apply only to the breach of outward doors or windows; to a breach of the house for the purpose of arresting the occupier or any of his family; and to arrests in the first instance.

Outward doors or windows are such as are intended for the security of the house against persons from without endeavouring to break in. (r) These are protected by the privilege which has been before mentioned; but if the officer find the outward door open, or it be opened to him from within, he may then break open any inward door, if he find that necessary in order to execute his process. (s) Thus, it has been holden that an officer, having entered peaceably at the outer door of a house, was justified in breaking open the door of a lodger, who occupied the first and second floors, in order to arrest such lodger. (t) And in a late case it was decided, that a sheriff's officer in execution of mesne process, who had first gained peaceable entrance at the outer door of the house of A., might break open the windows of the room of B., a person residing in such house; B. having refused to open the door of the room, after being informed by the officer that he had a warrant against him. (u) But it seems that if the party, against whom the process is issued, be not within the house at the time, the officer can only justify breaking open inner doors in order to search for him, after having first demanded admittance. (v) Though in case the person, or the goods of the defendant, are contained in the house which the officer has entered, he may break open any door within the house without any further demand. (w) If, however, the house is the house of a stranger, and not of the defendant, the officer must be careful to ascertain that the person or the goods (according to the nature of the process) of the defendant are within, before he breaks open any inner door; as, if they are not, he will not be justified. (x)

In a case where an outward door was in part open (being divided into two parts, the lower hatch of which was closed, and the upper part open), and the officer put his arm over the hatch, to open the part which was closed, upon which a struggle ensued between him and a friend of the prisoner, and, the officer prevailing, the prisoner shot at and killed him; it was held to be murder. (y)

The privilege of every man's house being his castle applies only to the breach of outward doors.

What constitutes the dwelling-house.

The privilege only extends to the dwelling-house, but it should seem that within that term are comprehended all such buildings as are within the curtilage, and as are considered as parcel of the dwelling-house at common law. In trespass the defendant justified an entry into a close and breaking into a barn under a fiere facias; the plaintiff replied that the door of the barn was shut, and it was adjudged upon demurrer that in such a case the sheriff can break open the door of the barn without a request, in order to take the goods; for it shall be intended to be a barn in a field, and not a barn which is parcel of a house. For the Court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining to and parcel of the house, it could not be broken open. (z)

This personal privilege of an individual, in respect to his outer door or window, is confined also to cases where the breach of the house is made in order to arrest the occupier or any of his family, who have their domicile, their ordinary residence, there: for if a stranger, whose ordinary residence is elsewhere, upon a pursuit, take refuge in the house of another, this is not the castle of such stranger, nor can he claim in it the benefit of sanctuary. (a) But it should be observed, that in all cases where the doors of strangers are broken open, upon the supposition of the person sought being there, it must be at the peril of finding him there; unless, as it seems, where the parties act under the sanction of a magistrate's warrant. (b) And an officer cannot even enter the house of a stranger, though the door be open, for the purpose of taking the goods of a defendant, but at his peril as to the goods being found there or not; and if they be not found there, he is a trespasser. (c) A sheriff's officer is not justified in entering and searching the house of a stranger, though the door be open, for the purpose of arresting a defendant under a capias ad satisfaciendum, although the defendant may have resided there immediately before the entry, and although the officers have reasonable cause court. The point reserved related to the legality of the attachment. Ante, p. 827.

Bl. 120, says, 'it seems to follow from this that, as a house in which the defendant habitually resides is on the same footing with respect to executions as his own house, the sheriff would not be justified in breaking the outer door of such a house, even after demand of admittance and refusal.'

(b) 2 Hale, 103. Fost. 321. 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 87. p. 324. Mr. Smith, in the same note, says, 'there may, perhaps, be another case in which the sheriff might justify entering the house of a stranger, upon bare suspicion, viz., if the stranger were to use fraud, and to inveigle the sheriff into a belief that the defendant was concealed in his house for the purpose of favouring his escape, while the officers should be detained in searching, or for any other reason, it might be held that he could not take advantage of his own deceit so as to treat the sheriff who entered under the false supposition thus induced as a trespasser; or, perhaps, such conduct might be held to amount to a license to the sheriff to enter.' It certainly is reasonable in such a case that the party should not be permitted to show that in fact the defendant was not concealed in this house, and this would be in accordance with the principles established by Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 469. Heane v. Rogers, 9 B. & C. 586. Kieran v. Sanders, 6 A. & E. 515, and Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90, in which last case it was held that a party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith and understanding of a fact, which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving. C. S. G.

(c) Cooke v. Birt, 5 Taunt. 765.

The privilege only extends to cases where the house is broken, in order to arrest the occupier or any of his family.

to suspect that the defendant is in the house ; if it turned out that he was not in the house at the time ; for a party who enters the house of a stranger to search for and arrest a defendant, can be justified only by finding him there. But if a sheriff enters the house of the defendant for the purpose of arresting him or taking his goods, he is justified if he has reasonable grounds for believing that the party or his goods are there. (d) And it has been decided that a sheriff cannot justify breaking the inner doors of the house of a stranger, upon suspicion that a defendant is there, in order to search for such defendant, and arrest him on mesne process. (e)

And the privilege is also confined to arrests in the first instance. For if a man, being legally arrested, (f) escape from the officer, and take shelter, though in his own house, the officer may, upon fresh suit, break open doors in order to retake him, having first given due notice of his business, and demanded admission, and been refused. (g) If it be not, however, upon fresh pursuit, it seems that the officer should have a warrant from a magistrate : and it should be observed, that the officer will not be authorized to break open doors in order to retake a prisoner in any case where the first arrest has been illegal. (h) Therefore, where an officer had made an illegal arrest on civil process, and was obliged to retire by the party's snapping a pistol at him several times, and afterwards returned again with assistants, who attempted to force the door, when the party within shot one of the assistants : it was ruled to be only manslaughter. (i)

In all cases where the officer or his assistants, having entered a house in the execution of their duty, are locked in, they may justify breaking open the doors to regain their liberty. (k) So where a sheriff being lawfully in a house makes a lawful seizure of the goods of the owner of the house, and cannot take the goods out of the house without opening the outer door, and neither the owner nor anyone else is there so that he can request them to open the door, he may break the door open to take out the goods. (l)

It has been deemed a question worthy of great consideration how far third persons, especially mere strangers, interposing in behalf of a party illegally arrested, are entitled to insist upon the illegality of the arrest, in their defence, as extenuating their guilt in killing the officer.

The point was raised in the following case :—One Bray, who was a constable of St. Margaret's parish in Westminster, came into the parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, where he was no constable, and consequently had no authority ; (m) and there took up one Anne Dekins, under suspicion of being a disorderly person, but who had not misbehaved herself, and against whom Bray had no warrant. The prisoners came up; and, though they were all strangers to the woman, drew their swords, and assaulted Bray, for the purpose of rescuing the woman from his custody; upon which he showed them his constable's staff, declared that he was about the Queen's business, and intended them no harm. The prisoners then put up their swords; and Bray carried the woman to the round-house in Covent Garden. A short time afterwards, the woman being still in the round-house, the prisoners drew their swords again, and assaulted Bray, on account of her imprisonment, and to get her discharged. Bray called some persons to his assistance, to keep the woman in custody, and to defend himself from the violence of the prisoners; upon which a person named Dent came to his assistance; and before any stroke received, one of the prisoners gave Dent, while assisting the constable, a mortal wound. This case was elaborately argued; and the Judges were divided in opinion; seven of them holding that the offence was manslaughter only, and five that it was murder. (n) The seven Judges who held that it was manslaughter thought that it was a sudden action, without any precedent malice or apparent design of doing hurt, but only to prevent the imprisonment of the woman and to rescue her who was unlawfully restrained of her liberty; and that it could not be murder, if the woman was unlawfully imprisoned; (o) and they also thought that the prisoners, in this case, had sufficient provocation: on the ground that if one be imprisoned upon an unlawful authority, it is a sufficient provocation to all people, out of compassion, and much more where it is done under a colour of justice; (p) and that, where the liberty of the subject is invaded, it is a provocation to all the subjects of England. But the five Judges who differed thought that, the woman being a stranger to the prisoners, it could not be a provocation to them; otherwise if she had been a friend or servant; and that it would be dangerous to allow such a power of interference to the mob.

Hugget's case.

The case of Hugget, and also that of Sir Henry Ferrers, appear to have been relied upon in support of the argument of the seven Judges, who in the preceding case held the offence to be manslaughter. Hugget's case, in the fuller report of it, (q) appears to have been thus:—Berry and two others pressed a man without any warrant for so doing; to which the man quietly submitted, and went along with them. The prisoner with three others, seeing them, instantly pursued them, and required to see their warrant; on which Berry showed them a paper, which the prisoner and his associates said was no warrant, and immediately drew their swords to rescue the impressed man, and thrust at Berry; whereupon Berry and his two companions drew their swords, and a fight ensued, in which Hugget killed Berry. But this case is stated very differently by Lord Hale, as having been under the following circumstances:—A press-master seized B. for a soldier; and, with the assistance of C., laid hold of him. D. finding fault with the rudeness of C., there grew a quarrel between them, and D. killed C.; and by the advice of all the Judges, except very few, it was ruled that this was but manslaughter. (r) The case of Sir Henry Ferrers was only this:—That Sir Henry Ferrers being arrested for debt, upon an illegal warrant, his servant, in seeking to rescue him, as was pretended, killed the officer; but, upon the evidence, it appeared clearly, that Sir Henry Ferrers, upon the arrest, obeyed, and was put into a house before the fighting between the officer and his servant; wherefore he was found not guilty of the murder and manslaughter. (s)

Sir H. Ferrers' case.

But Mr. Justice Foster is of opinion, that these cases of Hugget and Sir Henry Ferrers' servant did not warrant the doctrine laid down by the seven Judges in the case of Tooley; and this great master of the crown law (t) has animadverted upon that doctrine with much force, viewing it as having carried the law in favour of private persons officiously interposing in cases of illegal arrest further than sound reason, founded on the principles of true policy, will warrant. (u) After observing that, in Hugget's case, swords were drawn, a mutual combat ensued, the blood was heated before the mortal wound was given, and a rescue seemed to be practicable at the time the affray began; (v) whereas, though in Tooley's case, the prisoners had, at the first meeting, drawn their swords against the constable unarmed, they had put them up again, appearing to be pacified, and cool reflection seeming to have taken place; and it was at the second meeting that the deceased received his death wound, before a blow was given or offered by him or any of his party; and also in that case there was no possibility of rescue, the woman having been secured in the round-house; he says, that the second assault on the constable seems rather to have been grounded upon resentment, or a principle of revenge, for what had before passed, than upon any hope or endeavour to assist the woman. He then proceeds, 'Now, what was the case of Tooley and his accomplices, stript of a pomp of words, and the colourings of artificial reasoning? They saw a woman, for aught appears, a perfect stranger to them, led to the round-house under a charge of a criminal nature. This, upon evidence at the Old Bailey, a month or two afterwards, comes out to be an illegal arrest and imprisonment, a violation of Magna Charta; and these ruffians are presumed to have been seized, all on a sudden, with a strong fit of zeal for Magna Charta (w) and the laws; and in this frenzy to have drawn upon the constable, and stabbed his assistant. It is extremely held it to be manslaughter, put the point upon an endeavour to rescue.

(w) Holt, C. J., in delivering the judgment in Tooley's case, said, 'Sure a man ought to be concerned for Magna Charta and the laws; and if anyone against the law imprison a man, he is an offender against Magna Charta.'

difficult to conceive that the violation of Magna Charta, a fact of which they were totally ignorant at the time, could be the provocation which led them into this outrage. But, admitting for argument sake that it was, we all know that words of reproach, how grating and offensive soever, are in the eye of the law no provocation in the case of voluntary homicide; and yet every man who hath considered the human frame, or but attended to the workings of his own heart, knows that affronts of that kind pierce deeper, and stimulate the veins more effectually, than a slight injury done to a third person, though under colour of justice, possibly can. The indignation that kindles in the breast in one case is instinct, it is human infirmity; in the other it may possibly be called a concern for the common rights of the subject; but this concern, when well founded, is rather founded in reason and cool reflection, than in human infirmity; and it is to human infirmity alone that the law indulges in the case of a sudden provocation.' He then proceeds further: 'But if a passion for the common rights of the subject, in the case of individuals, must, against all experience, be presumed to inflame beyond a personal affront, let us suppose the case of an upright and deserving man, universally beloved and esteemed, standing at the place of execution, under a sentence of death manifestly unjust. This is a case that may well rouse the indignation, and excite the compassion, of the wisest and best men; but wise and good men know that it is the duty of private subjects to leave the innocent man to his lot, how hard soever it may be, without attempting a rescue; for otherwise all government would be unhinged. And yet, what proportion doth the case of a false imprisonment, for a short time, and for which the injured party may have an adequate remedy, bear to that I have now put?' (x)

In a more recent case, the prisoner, who cohabited with a person named Farmello, killed an assistant of a constable, who came to apprehend Farmello, as an idle and disorderly person, under the 19 Geo. 2, c. 10. Farmello, though he was not an object of the act, did not himself make any resistance to the arrest; but the prisoner, immediately upon the constable and his assistant requiring Farmello to go along with them, without making use of any argument to induce them to desist, or saying one word to prevent the intended arrest, stabbed the assistant. And Hotham, B., with whom Gould, J., and Ashurst, J., concurred, held the offence to be murder. A special verdict, however, was found: (y) and the case was argued in the Exchequer Chamber, before ten of the Judges; but no opinion was ever publicly delivered. (z)

SEC. IV.

Cases where the Killing takes place in the Prosecution of some other Criminal, Unlawful, or Wanton Act.

It has been shown, that where from an action, unlawful in itself, done deliberately, and with mischievous intention, death ensues, though against or beside the original intention of the party, it will be murder: (a) and it may be here observed, that if such deliberation and mischievous intention does not appear, (which is matter of fact, and to be collected from circumstances,) and the act was done heedlessly and incautiously, it will be manslaughter. (b)

incautious acts.

Where an injury, intended against one person, mortally affects another, as where a blow aimed at one person lights upon another and kills him, the inquiry will be whether, if the blow had killed the person against whom it was aimed, the offence would have been murder or manslaughter. For if a blow, intended against A., and lighting on B., arose from a sudden transport of passion, which, in case A. had died by it, would have reduced the offence to manslaughter, the fact will admit of the same alleviation, if it shall have caused the death of B. (c)

one person kills

There are many acts so heedless and incautious as necessarily to be deemed unlawful and wanton, though there may not be any express intent to do mischief: and the party committing them, and causing death by such conduct, will be guilty of manslaughter. As if a person, breaking an unruly horse, ride him amongst a crowd of people, and death ensue from the viciousness of the animal, and it appear clearly to have been done heedlessly and incautiously only, and not with an intent to do mischief, the crime will be manslaughter. (d) But it is said, that in such a case it would be murder if the rider had intended to divert himself with the fright of the crowd. (e) And if a man, knowing that people are passing along the streets, throw a stone or shoot an arrow over a

& P. 778, upon an indictment for murder, where it appeared that the deceased, who was a watchman, and another were taking a person towards a station-house on a charge of robbing a garden, and were proceeding quietly along a road, the prisoner making no resistance, when they were attacked and the deceased beaten to death; in opening the case it was asserted, that even if the prisoner were not lawfully in custody, the offence was murder; for if a person were illegally in custody, and was making no resistance, no person had any right to attack the persons who had him in custody, and that if they did, and death ensued in consequence of the violence used to release the prisoner, it was murder; and that although there might be old cases to the contrary, they were no longer considered as binding authorities; the point, however, did not ultimately become material, as it was held that the party was in lawful custody, but the above position was neither controverted by the very learned Judge who tried the case, nor by the prisoner's counsel; and it should seem that it could not be successfully disputed, for it is difficult to discover upon what principle any individual can be justified in interfering to prevent what apparently is the due execution of the law, and that the question, whether he is guilty of murder or manslaughter, if death ensue, is to depend upon whether the custody is legal or illegal, of which, probably, at the time, he was perfectly ignorant, and which, consequently, could in no respect influence his conduct. house or wall, and a person be thereby killed, this will be manslaughter, though there were no intention to do hurt to anyone, because the act itself was unlawful. (f) So where a gentleman came to town in a chaise, and, before he got out of it, fired his pistols in the street, which, by accident, killed a woman, it was ruled manslaughter; for the act was likely to breed danger, and manifestly improper. (g)

spirits in an unfit quantity.

A party who causes the death of a child by giving it spirituous liquors, in a quantity quite unfit for its tender age, is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, which charged the prisoner with giving a quartern of gin to a child of the age of four years, which caused its death, and which quantity of gin was averred to be excessive for a child of that age, it appeared that the prisoner having ordered a quartern of gin, asked the child if it would have a drop, and that on his putting the glass to the child's mouth, the child twisted the glass out of his hand, and swallowed nearly the whole of the gin, which caused its death. Vaughan, B.: 'As it appears clearly that the drinking of the gin in this quantity was the act of the child, the prisoner must be acquitted; but if it had appeared that the prisoner had willingly given a child of this tender age a quartern of gin out of a sort of brutal fun, and had thereby caused its death, I should most decidedly have held that to be manslaughter, because I have no doubt that the causing the death of a child by giving it spirituous liquors in a quantity quite unfit for its tender age, amounts, in point of law, to that offence.' (h)

Giving a person liquors, &c.

Where an indictment for manslaughter stated that the prisoner gave, administered, and delivered to M. A. divers large and excessive quantities of wine and porter, and induced, procured, and persuaded M. A. to take, drink, and swallow the said quantities of spirituous liquors; the same being likely to cause and procure his death, and which the prisoners then and there well knew; and that M. A., by means of the said inducement, procurement, and persuasion took, drank, and swallowed the said large quantities of spirituous liquors; by means whereof he became greatly drunk, &c., and while he was so drunk as aforesaid, the prisoners made an assault on him and forced and compelled him to go, and put, placed, and confined him in a cabriolet, and drove and carried him about therein for a long time, and thereby shook, threw, pulled, and knocked about M. A., by means whereof M. A. became mortally sick; of which said large quantities of spirituous liquors, and of the drunkenness occasioned thereby, and of the said shaking, &c., and the sickness occasioned thereby, M. A. died; it appeared that the deceased was in possession of the goods of one of the prisoners under a warrant from the sheriff, and the three prisoners plied him with drink, themselves drinking freely also, and when he was very drunk, put him into a cabriolet, and caused him to be driven about the streets, and about two hours after he was put in the cabriolet he was found dead. prisoners knew that the quantity of liquor taken was likely to cause death, of which there did not appear to be any evidence, and which, if proved, would make the offence approach to murder, told the jury that if they were of opinion that the prisoners put the deceased in the cabriolet, then the questions would be: first, whether they or any of them were guilty of administering or procuring the deceased to take large quantities of liquor for an unlawful purpose; or, whether, when he had taken it, they put him into the cabriolet for an unlawful purpose. If they thought that the three prisoners, or one of them, made him excessively drunk, to enable the prisoner, whose goods were seized, to prevent the completion of the execution; or if they were satisfied that the object of the prisoners, or any of them, was otherwise unlawful, and that the death of the deceased was caused in carrying their unlawful object into effect, they must be found guilty. The simple fact of persons getting together to drink, or one pressing another to do so, was not an unlawful act; or, if death ensued, an offence that could be construed into manslaughter. Upon the first question stated, it would be essential to make out that the prisoners administered the liquor with the intention of making the deceased drunk, and then getting him out of the house; and if that were doubtful, still if, when he was drunk, they removed him into the cabriolet with the intention of preventing his returning, and death was the result of such removal, the act was unlawful, and the case would be a case of manslaughter. If, however, they all got drunk together, and afterwards he was put into the cabriolet with an intention that he should take a drive only, that was not an unlawful object, such as had been described, and the prisoners would be entitled to an acquittal. And to a question put by the jury, the learned Baron answered, that if the prisoners, when the deceased was drunk, drove him about in the cab, in order to keep him out of possession, and by so doing accelerated his death, it would be manslaughter. (i)

It has been shown, that where death ensues from an act done in the prosecution of a felonious intention, it will be murder; (k) but a distinction is taken in the case of an act done with the intent only of committing a bare trespass; as if death ensues from such act, the offence will be only manslaughter. (l) Thus, though if A. shoot at the poultry of B., intending to steal them, and by accident kill a man, it will be murder; yet, if he shoot at them wantonly, and without any such felonious intention, and accidentally kill a man, the offence will be only manslaughter. (m) And anyone, who voluntarily, knowingly, and unlawfully, intends hurt to the person of another, though he intend not death, yet, if death ensue, is guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances of the nature of the instrument used, and the manner of using it, as calculated to produce great bodily harm or not. (n) And if a man be doing an unlawful act, though not intending bodily harm to anyone, as if he be throwing a stone at another's horse, and hit a person and kill him, it is manslaughter. (o) But it seems, that in cases of this kind the guilt would rather depend upon one or other of these circumstances, either that the act might probably breed danger, or that it was done with a mischievous intent. (p)

Where a carman was in the front part of a cart loading it with sacks of potatoes, and a boy pulled the trapstick out of the front of the cart, but not with intent to do the man any harm, as he had seen it done several times before by others; and in consequence of the trapstick having been taken out, the cart tilted up, and the deceased was thrown out on his back on the stones, and the potatoes were shot out of the sacks, and fell on and covered him over, and he died in consequence of the injuries then received, it was held that the boy was guilty of manslaughter. (q) So where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the prisoners in and upon one L. H. did make an assault, and that L. H. then lying in a certain cart containing divers bags of nails of great weight, the prisoners did with their hands force up the shafts of the said cart, and throw down the body of the said cart in which L. H. was so as aforesaid lying, and him the said L. H. by such forcing up of the shafts and throwing down of the body of the said cart as aforesaid, did cast and throw upon the ground under the said bags of nails; by means whereof the said bags of nails were thrown and forced against over and upon the breast of L. H., L. H. then being upon the ground, and the said bags of nails then and there did press and lie upon the breast of L. H., thereby giving, &c., and it was urged that this indictment was bad, as it did not allege that the prisoners knew that the deceased was in the cart; Taunton, J., held that it was not necessary to allege such knowledge, as malice was not an ingredient in the crime. (r)

Gun discharged in a struggle.

On an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the deceased having deposited a gun with the prisoner for a loan of money, called at the prisoner's house when he was absent, and took the gun away without repaying the loan. When the prisoner found the gun was gone he went after the deceased, and demanded it back. The deceased refused to comply, and the prisoner thereupon endeavoured to wrest it from him. The deceased said that the gun was loaded; the prisoner, however, persisted in his attempt to take it away, and after a violent struggle succeeded in doing so; but, falling on the ground as he was in the act of wrenching the gun away, the gun went off accidentally, and killed the deceased. Lord Campbell, C. J., told the jury that, though the prisoner had a right to the possession of the gun, to take it away from the deceased by force was unlawful; and that, as the discharge of the gun was the result of this unlawful act, it was their duty to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. (s)

On an indictment for manslaughter, a statement of the prisoner was proved as follows: 'As I was going home about four o'clock this afternoon I heard the report of a gun. Shortly afterwards I saw the deceased with a gun, and I went to him to take his gun from him. We had a scuffle together for about ten minutes, and there were blows exchanged on both sides; the deceased struck me, and knocked me down with his gun; at the same time the gun went off, and shot the deceased. I was insensible for a short time, and when I came round found the deceased was dead and had the barrel of the gun in his hand.' The prisoner was a game-keeper of a gentleman who had permission by parol to shoot over the land where this transaction took place. It was contended that, admitting the prisoner had no right to take the gun away, and that he was guilty of an assault in attempting to do so, the death was not the result of that assault, but of the excess of violence of the deceased himself. Lord Campbell, C. J., told the jury that the case was one of manslaughter. The struggle between the prisoner and the deceased was to be considered as one continuous illegal act on the part of the prisoner, and death resulting from that act. (t)

Where a defendant kept a gun loaded with printing types, in consequence of several robberies having been committed in the neighbourhood, and sent a mulatto girl, his servant, of the age of about thirteen, for the gun, desiring the person in whose house he lodged to take the priming out; which he did, and told the girl so, and delivered the gun to her, and she put it down in the kitchen, resting on the butt, and soon afterwards took it up again, and presented it, in play, at the plaintiff's son, a young boy, saying she would shoot him, and drew the trigger, and the gun went off, and wounded the boy; it was held that the defendant was liable to an action for the injury. Lord Ellenborough, C. J.: 'The defendant might and ought to have gone farther; it was incumbent on him, who, by charging the gun, had made it capable of doing mischief, to render it safe and innoxious. This might have been done by the discharge or drawing the contents; and though it was the defendant's intention to prevent all mischief, and he expected that this would be effectuated by taking out the priming, the event has unfortunately proved that the order to his landlord was not sufficient; consequently, as by this want of care the instrument was left in a state capable of doing mischief, the law will hold the defendant responsible.' (u) And therefore it should seem, that if death had ensued the defendant would have been guilty of manslaughter.

If death ensues in consequence of a wrongful act, which the

If death ensues in consequence

(t) Reg. v. Wesley, 1 F. & F. 528. Lord Campbell refused to reserve the point; and yet it seems well deserving of better consideration. If the prisoner had died from the excess of violence inflicted by the deceased, it cannot be doubted that the deceased would have been guilty of manslaughter, and it is not a little startling to hold that that excess of violence which caused the gun to explode is to make the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. Suppose the deceased had pulled the trigger intending to shoot the prisoner, and in the struggle he had shot himself instead, it would be startling to hold the prisoner guilty of manslaughter.

The reason why an excess of violence is punished is, that it is not in point of law attributable to the assault committed, but to the wrongful act of the party assaulted, and to hold the party assaulting guilty of the result of an excess of violence is to hold him guilty of the consequence of an act, of which the law not only holds him not to be guilty, but holds the other party to be guilty, or, to put it in still simpler terms, to hold him responsible for an act which the law holds not to be his act at all, but to be wholly the act of another person.

party who commits it can neither justify nor excuse, it is manslaughter. An indictment charged that there was a scaffolding in a certain coal mine, and that the prisoners, by throwing large stones down the mine, broke the scaffolding; and that in consequence of the scaffolding being so broken, a corf, in which the deceased was descending the mine, struck against a beam, on which the scaffolding had been supported, and by such striking the corf was overturned, and the deceased precipitated into the mine and killed. It was proved that scaffolding was usually found in mines in the neighbourhood, for the purpose of supporting the corves, and enabling the workmen to get out and work the mines; that the stones were of a size and weight sufficient to knock away the scaffolding, and that if the beam only was left, the probable consequence would be that the corf striking against it would upset, and occasion death or injury. Tindal, C. J.: 'If death ensues as the consequence of a wrongful act, an act which the party who commits it can neither justify nor excuse, it is not accidental death but manslaughter. If the wrongful act was done under circumstances which show an intent to kill, or do any serious injury in the particular case, or any general malice, the offence becomes that of murder. In the present instance, the act was one of mere wantonness and sport, but still the act was wrongful — it was a trespass. The only question therefore is, whether the death of the party is to be fairly and reasonably considered as a consequence of such wrongful act; if it followed from such wrongful act, as an effect from a cause, the offence is manslaughter; if it is altogether unconnected with it, it is accidental death.' (v)

Where sports are unlawful in themselves, or productive of danger, riot, or disorder, so as to endanger the peace, and death ensue, in the pursuit of them, the party killing is guilty of manslaughter. (w) Such manly sports and exercises as tend to give strength, activity, and skill in the use of arms, and are entered into as private recreations amongst friends, are not, however, deemed unlawful sports; (x) but prize-fighting, public boxing matches, or any other sports of a similar kind, which are exhibited for lucre, and tend to encourage idleness by drawing together a number of disorderly people, have met with a different consideration. (y) For in these last-mentioned cases the intention of the parties is not innocent in itself, each being careless of what hurt may be given, provided the promised reward or applause be obtained; and meetings of this kind have also a strong tendency in their nature to a breach of the peace. (z) Therefore, where the prisoner had killed his opponent in a boxing match, it was holden that he was guilty of manslaughter; though he had been challenged to fight by his adversary for a public trial of skill in boxing, and was also urged to engage by taunts; and the occasion was sudden. deed, just as much so as that persons should go out to fight with deadly weapons, and it is not at all material which party strikes the first blow; and all persons who go to a prize-fight to see the combatants strike each other, and who are present when they do so, are in point of law guilty of an assault. (b) Where it appeared that there was a fight between the deceased and another person, at which a great number of persons were assembled, and that in the course of the fight the ring was broken in several times by the persons assembled, who had sticks, which they used with great violence, and the deceased died in consequence of blows received on this occasion, and for the prisoner it was attempted to be proved, that though he was present during the fight, yet he neither did nor said anything. Littledale, J., said, 'If the prisoner was at this fight encouraging it by his presence, he is guilty of manslaughter, although he took no active part in it. My attention has been called to the evidence of those witnesses who have said that the prisoner did nothing; but I am of opinion that persons who are at a fight, in consequence of which death ensues, are all guilty of manslaughter, if they encouraged it by their presence: I mean if they remained present during the fight. I say that if they were not casually passing by, but stayed at the place, they encouraged it by their presence, although they did not say or do anything. This is my opinion of the law of this case. However, you ought to consider whether the deceased came by his death in consequence of blows he received in the fight itself; for if he came by his death by any means not connected with the fight itself, that is, if his death was caused by the mob coming in with bludgeons, and taking the matter as it were out of the hands of the combatants, then persons merely present encouraging the fight would not be answerable, unless they are connected in some way with that particular violence. If the death occurred from the fight itself, all persons encouraging it by their presence are guilty of manslaughter; but if the death ensued from violence unconnected with the fight itself, that is, by blows given not by the other combatant in the course of the fight, but by persons breaking in the ring and striking with their sticks, those who were merely present are not, by being present, guilty of manslaughter.' (c)

The custom of cock-throwing at Shrovetide has been considered as an idle, dangerous, and unlawful sport; and accordingly where a person throwing at a cock missed his aim, and killed a child who was looking on, Foster, J., ruled it to be manslaughter; and, speaking of the custom, he says, 'it is a barbarous, unmanly custom, frequently productive of great disorders, dangerous to the by-standers, and ought to be discouraged.' (d) So throwing stones at another wantonly in play, being a dangerous sport without the least appearance of any good intent, or doing any other such idle action as cannot but endanger the bodily hurt of some one or other, and by such means killing a person, will be manslaughter. (e)

Though the sports be not in their nature unlawful, yet, if the weapons used be of an improper and deadly nature, the party killing will be guilty of manslaughter: as was the case of Sir John Chichester, who unfortunately killed his man-servant as he was playing with him. Sir John Chichester made a pass at the servant with the sword in the scabbard, and the servant parried it with a bed-staff, but in so doing struck off the chape of the scabbard, whereby the end of the sword came out of the scabbard: and the thrust not being effectually broken, the servant was killed by the point of the sword. (f) This was adjudged manslaughter: and Foster, J. thinks, in conformity with Lord Hale, that it was rightly so adjudged, on the ground that there was evidently a want of common caution in making use of a deadly weapon in so violent an exercise, where it was highly probable that the chape might be beaten off, which would necessarily expose the servant to great bodily harm. (g)

Shooting at deer in another's park, without leave, is an unlawful act, though done in sport, and without any felonious intent: and therefore if a bystander be killed by the shot, such killing will be manslaughter. (h)

join to do an unlawful act.

It has been shown, that where a body of persons, resolving generally to resist all opposers in the commission of any breach of the peace, and to execute it in such a manner as naturally tends to raise tumults and affrays, happen to kill anyone in the prosecution of this unlawful purpose, they will be guilty of murder. (i) Yet, in one case, where divers rioters, having forcibly gained possession of a house, afterwards killed a partisan of the person whom they had ejected, as he, in company with a number of others, was endeavouring in the night forcibly to regain the possession, and to fire the house, they were adjudged guilty only of manslaughter. (k) It is said, that perhaps it was so adjudged for this reason, that the person slain was so much in fault himself. (l)

the party performing it, and in the prosecution of his purpose causing the death of another person, guilty of murder. (m) And as the circumstances of the case may vary, the party so killing another may be guilty only of the extenuated offence of manslaughter.

Though officers of justice are authorized to execute their duties in a proper and legal manner, notwithstanding any resistance which may be made to them; (n) yet they should not come to extremities upon every slight interruption, nor unless there be a reasonable necessity. Therefore, where a collector, having distrained for a duty, laid hold of a maid servant who stood at the door to prevent the distress being carried away, and beat her head and back several times against the door-post, of which she died; although the Court held her opposition to the officer to be a sufficient provocation to extenuate the homicide, yet they were clearly of opinion that he was guilty of manslaughter in so far exceeding the necessity of the case. (o)

There is a case reported in Strange, as a case of manslaughter, which, if the circumstances of it were as stated in that report, does not seem to have been entitled to so favourable a construction. Mr. Lutterel, being arrested for a small debt, prevailed on one of the officers to go with him to his lodgings, while the other was sent to fetch the attorney's bill, in order, as Lutterel pretended, to have the debt and costs paid. Words arose at the lodgings about civility money, which Lutterel refused to give; and he went up stairs, pretending to fetch money for the payment of the debt and costs, leaving the officer below. He soon returned with a brace of loaded pistols in his bosom, which, at the importunity of his servant, he laid down on the table, saying, 'He did not intend to hurt the officers, but he would not be ill used.' The officer who had been sent for the attorney's bill soon returned to his companion at the lodgings; and, words of anger arising, Lutterel struck one of the officers on the face with a walking cane, and drew a little blood. Whereupon both of them fell upon him; one stabbed him in nine places, he all the while on the ground begging for mercy, and unable to resist them; and one of them fired one of the pistols at him while on the ground, and gave him his death's wound. (p) This is reported to have been holden manslaughter, by reason of the first assault with the cane: but Foster, J., thinks it a very extraordinary case, as thus reported; and mentions the following additional circumstances, which are stated in another report. (q) 1. Mr. Lutterel had a sword by his side, which, after the affray was over, was found drawn and broken. 2. When Mr. Lutterel laid the pistols on the table, he declared that he brought them down because he would not be forced out of his lodgings. 3. He threatened the officers several times. 4. One of the officers appeared to have been wounded in the hand by a pistol shot (for both pistols were discharged in the affray), and slightly wounded on the wrist by some sharp-pointed weapon, and the other was slightly wounded in the hand by a like weapon. 5. touching Mr. Lutterel's begging for mercy was not that he was on the ground begging for mercy, but that on the ground he held up his hands as if he was begging for mercy. Upon these facts the Chief Justice directed the jury, that if they believed Mr. Lutterel endeavoured to rescue himself, which he seemed to think was the case, and which very probably was the case, it would be justifiable homicide in the officers. And as Mr. Lutterel gave the first blow, accompanied with menaces to the officers, and the circumstance of producing loaded pistols to prevent their taking him from his lodgings, which it would have been their duty to have done, if the debt had not been paid or bail given, he declared it would be no more than manslaughter. Officers acting upon resistance.

Though resistance be made to an officer of justice, yet if the officer kill the party after the resistance is over, and the necessity has ceased, the crime will at least be manslaughter. (s)

Or upon the flight of the party arrested for felony.

Where a felony has been committed, or a dangerous wound given, and the party flies from justice, he may be killed in the pursuit, if he cannot otherwise be overtaken. And the same rule holds, if a felon, after arrest, break away as he is carrying to gaol, and his pursuers cannot retake without killing him. But if he may be taken in any case without such severity, it is, at least, manslaughter in him who kills him; and the jury ought to inquire whether it were done of necessity or not. (t) In making arrests in cases of misdemeanor and breach of the peace (with the exception, however, of some cases of flagrant misdemeanors), it is not lawful to kill the party accused if he fly from the arrest, though he cannot otherwise be overtaken, and though there be a warrant to apprehend him; and, generally speaking, it will be murder: but, under circumstances, it may amount only to manslaughter, if it appear that death was not intended. (u)

Misdemeanor.

Although an officer must not kill for an escape, where the party is in custody for a misdemeanor, yet if the party assault the officer with such violence that he has reasonable ground for believing his life to be in peril, he may justify killing the party. Upon a trial for murder it appeared that the prisoner, an excise officer, being in the execution of his office, had seized, with the assistance of another person, two smugglers in the act of landing whiskey from the Scottish shore, contrary to law; the deceased had surrendered himself quietly into the hands of the prisoner, but shortly afterwards, when the prisoner was off his guard, he assaulted him violently with an ash stick, which cut his head severely in several places, and he lost much blood, and was greatly weakened in the struggle which succeeded; the officer, fearing the deceased would overpower him, and having no other means of defending himself, discharged a pistol at the deceased's legs, in the hopes of deterring him from any further attack, but the discharge did not take effect, and the deceased prepared to make another assault; that, seeing this, the prisoner warned him to keep off, telling him he must shoot him if he did not; but the deceased disregarded the warning, and rushed towards him to make a fresh attack; that he thereupon fired a second pistol, and killed him. Holroyd, J., told the jury, 'an officer must not kill for an escape, where the party is in custody for a misdemeanor; but if the prisoner had reasonable ground for believing himself to be in peril of his own life, or of bodily harm, and no other weapon was at hand to make use of, or if he was rendered incapable of making use of such weapon by the previous violence that he had received, then he was justified. If an affray arises, and blows are received, and weapons used in heat, and death ensues, although the party may have been at the commencement in the prosecution of something unlawful, still it would be manslaughter in the killer. In this case it is admitted that the custody was lawful. The question is, whether, under all the circumstances, the deceased being in the prosecution of an illegal act, and having made the first assault, the prisoner had such reasonable occasion to resort to a deadly weapon to defend himself, as any reasonable man might fairly and naturally be expected to resort to.' (v)

In civil suits, if the party against whom the process has issued, fly from the officer endeavouring to arrest him, and be killed by him in the pursuit, it has been said that it will be murder. (w) But it is rather to be considered as murder or manslaughter, as circumstances may vary the case; for if the officer, in the heat of the pursuit, and merely in order to overtake the party, should trip up his heels, or give him a stroke with an ordinary cudgel, or other weapon not likely to kill, and death should unhappily ensue, this will not amount to more than manslaughter, if, in some cases, even to that offence. (x)

In cases of pressing for the sea service, if the party fly, the killing by the officer, in the pursuit to overtake him, will be manslaughter, at least, and in some cases murder, according to the rules which govern the case of misdemeanors; paying attention, nevertheless, to those usages which have prevailed in the sea service, in this respect, so far as they are authorized by the Courts which have ordinary jurisdiction over such matters, and are not expressly repugnant to the laws of the land. An officer in the impress service, put one of his seamen on board a boat belonging to one William Collyer, a fisherman, with intent to bring it under the stern of another vessel, in order to see if there were any fit objects of the impress service on board. The boat steered away in another direction; and the officer pursued in another vessel for three hours, firing several shots at her, with a musket loaded with ball, for the purpose of hitting the halyards, and bringing the boat to, which was found to be the usual way, and one of the shots unfortunately killed Collyer. The Court said, it was impossible for it to be more than manslaughter. (y) It is presumed, that this decision proceeded on the ground that the musket was not levelled at the deceased, nor any bodily hurt intended to him. But inasmuch as such an act was calculated to breed danger, and not warranted by law, though no bodily hurt were intended, it was holden to be manslaughter, and the defendant was burned in the hand. (z) It may here be observed, however, that by the statute for the prevention of smuggling, it is enacted, that in case any vessel or boat, liable to seizure or examination, shall not bring to on being required to do so, or being chased by any vessel or boat in her Majesty's navy, having the proper pendant and ensign of her Majesty's ships hoisted, or by any vessel or boat duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, having a proper pendant and ensign hoisted, it shall be lawful for the captain, master, or other person, having the charge or command of such vessel in her Majesty's navy, or employed as aforesaid (first causing a gun to be fired as a signal), to fire at or into such vessel or boat; and such captain, master, or other person, acting in his aid or assistance, or by his direction, shall be indemnified and discharged from any indictment, penalty, action, or other proceeding for so doing. (a)

Where an officer makes an arrest out of his proper district, or without any warrant or authority, (b) and purposely kills the party for not submitting to such illegal arrest, the crime will, generally speaking, be murder; that is, in all cases at least where an indifferent person, acting in the like manner, without any such pretence, would be guilty to that extent. (c) In the case of private persons, using their endeavours to bring felons to justice, caution must be used to ascertain that a felony has actually been committed, and that it has been committed by the party arrested or pursued upon suspicion; as, if the suspicion be not supported by the fact, the person endeavouring to arrest or imprison, and killing the party in the prosecution of such purpose, will be guilty of manslaughter. (d)

Gaolers.

Gaolers, like other ministers of justice, are bound not to exceed the necessity of the case in the execution of their offices; therefore, an assault upon a gaoler, which would warrant him (apart from personal danger) in killing a prisoner, must, it should seem, be such from whence he might reasonably apprehend that an escape was intended, which he could not otherwise prevent. (e) And if an officer, whose duty it is to execute a sentence of whipping upon a criminal, should be so barbarous as to exceed all bounds of moderation, and thereby cause the party's death, he will at least be guilty of manslaughter. (f)

Captains of vessels.

Persons on board ship are necessarily subjected to something like a despotic government, and it is extremely important that the law should regulate the conduct of those who exercise dominion over them. Therefore, in a case of manslaughter against the captain and mate of a vessel, by accelerating the death of a seaman really in ill health, but whom, they allege, they believe to be a skulker, that is, a person endeavouring to avoid his duty, the question is (in determining whether it is a slight or aggravated case), whether the phenomena of the disease were such as would excite the attention of humane and reasonable men; and, in such a case, if the deceased be taken on board after he was discharged from a hospital, it is important to inquire whether he was sent on board by the surgeon of the hospital as a person in a fit state of health to perform the duties of a seaman. (g)

Moderate and reasonable correction may properly be given by parents, masters, and other persons, having authority in foro domestico, to those who are under their care: but if the correction be immoderate or unreasonable, either in the measure of it, or in the instrument made use of for that purpose, it will be either murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances of the case. If it be done with a dangerous weapon, likely to kill or maim, due regard being always had to the age and strength of the party, it will be murder; but if with a cudgel, or other thing not likely to kill, though improper for the purpose of correction, it will be manslaughter. (h)

In the following case, the nature of the instrument used, and the probability of its causing death, or great bodily harm, when used in the manner stated in the case, occasioned much doubt. The prisoner having employed her daughter-in-law, a child of ten years old, to reel some yarn, and finding some of the skeins knotted, threw at the child a four-legged stool, which struck her on the right side of the head, on the temple, and caused her death soon afterwards. The stool was of sufficient size and weight to give a mortal blow: but the prisoner did not intend, at the time she threw it, to kill the child. These facts were stated in a special verdict: but the matter was considered of great difficulty, and no opinion was ever delivered by the Judges. (i)

Hazel's case.

In the foregoing case, the counsel for the prisoner cited the following case:—A shepherd boy had suffered some of the sheep, which he was employed in tending, to escape through the hurdles of their pen. The boy's master, the prisoner, seeing the sheep get through, ran towards the boy, and taking up a stake that was lying on the ground, threw it at him. The stake hit the boy on the head, and fractured his skull, of which fracture he soon afterwards died. Nares, J., in his directions to the jury, after stating that every master had a right moderately to chastise his servant, but that the chastisement must be on just grounds, and with an instrument properly adapted to the purposes of correction, desired them to consider, whether the stake, which, lying on the ground, was the first thing the prisoner saw, in the heat of his passion, was, or was not, under such circumstances, and in such a situation, an improper instrument. For that the using a weapon from which death is likely to ensue, imports a mischievous disposition; and the law implies that a degree of malice attended the act, which, if death actually happen, will be murder. Therefore, if the jury should think the stake was an improper instrument, they would further consider whether it was probable that it was used with an intent to kill; that if they thought it was, they must find the prisoner guilty of murder; but if they were persuaded it was Wiggs' case.

[646] not done with an intent to kill, the crime would then at most amount to manslaughter. The jury found it manslaughter. (h) In this case it is presumed that the learned Judge must be understood as meaning, that if the jury should think the instrument so improper as to be dangerous, and likely to kill or maim, the age and strength of the party killed being duly considered, the crime would amount to murder; as the law would in such case supply the malicious intent; but that if they thought that the instrument, though improper for the purpose of correction, was not likely to kill or maim, the crime would only be manslaughter, unless they should also think that there was an intent to kill.

Improper correction by a parent.

A mother, being angry with one of her children for not having prepared her dinner, as she had directed him to do, began to scold him, upon which he made her some very impertinent answers, which put her in a passion, and she took up a small piece of iron, used as a poker, intending to frighten him, and seeing she was very angry, he ran towards the door, when she threw the poker at him, and the iron struck the deceased, who happened to be coming in at the moment, on the head, and killed him: it was held, that when a blow intended for A. lights upon B., being given in a sudden transport of passion, if, supposing A. had been struck and died, it would have amounted to manslaughter, it is no less manslaughter if it causes the death of B., and there was no doubt, if the child at whom the blow was aimed had been struck and died, it would have been manslaughter; and so it was under the present circumstances. (l)

Nature of the provocation considered in a case where a child was killed by the correction of the parent.

Though the correction exceed the bounds of moderation, the Court will pay a tender regard to the nature of the provocation, where the act is manifestly accompanied with a good intent, and the instrument not such as must, in all probability, occasion death, though the party were hurried to great excess. A father, whose son had frequently been guilty of stealing, and who, upon complaints made to him of such thefts, had often corrected the son for them; at length, upon the son being charged with another theft, and resolutely denying it, though proved against him, beat him, in a passion, with a rope, by way of chastisement for the offence, so much that he died. The father expressed the utmost horror, and was in the greatest affliction for what he had done, intending only to have punished him with such severity as to have cured him of his wickedness. The learned Judge, by whom the father was tried, consulted his colleague in office, and the principal counsel on the circuit, who all concurred in opinion that it was only manslaughter; and so it was ruled. (m)

Excessive correction given under the belief that the deceased was shamming illness to avoid work.

The prisoner was aunt to the deceased, a girl about fifteen, who, with her sister, who was two or three years younger, had been placed, after their mother's death, under the prisoner's care, who employed them in stay-stitching fourteen or fifteen hours a day, and, when they did not do the required quantity of work, severely punished them with the cane and the rod. The deceased was in a consumption, and did not do so much work as her sister, and, in consequence, was much oftener and more cruelly punished by the prisoner, who accompanied her corrections with very violent and threatening language, and said that she was sure that she was acting the hypocrite and shamming illness, and that she had a very strong constitution. The surgeon said she died from consumption, but that her death was hastened by the treatment she had received. Under these circumstances, the counsel for the prosecution thought there was not proof of malice sufficient to constitute the crime of murder, as the prisoner always alleged that she believed the girl was shamming illness, and was really able to do the work required, and which it appeared her younger sister actually did, and the Court concurred in that opinion. (n)

Cases may occur in which the correction is not inflicted by means of any active and personal violence, but by a system of privation and ill-treatment. The following case seems to be of this nature:—The prisoner, upon his apprentice returning to him from Bridewell, whither he had been sent for misbehaviour, in a lousy and distempered condition, did not take that care of him which his situation required, and which he might have done; the apprentice not having been suffered to lie in a bed, on account of the vermin, but being made to lie on the boards for some time without covering, and without common medical care. In this case, the medical persons who were examined were of opinion, that the boy's death was most probably occasioned by his ill-treatment in Bridewell, and the want of care when he went home; and they inclined to think, that if he had been properly treated when he came home, he might have recovered. But, though some harsh expressions were proved to have been spoken by the prisoner to the boy, yet there was no evidence of any personal violence having been used by the prisoner; and it was proved that the apprentice had had sufficient sustenance; and the prisoner had a general good character for treating his apprentices with humanity, and had made application to get this boy into the hospital. Under these circumstances, the Recorder left it to the jury to consider, whether the death of the boy was occasioned by the ill-treatment he received from his master, after returning from Bridewell, and whether that ill-treatment amounted to evidence of malice, in which case they were to find him guilty of murder. At the same time they were told, with the concurrence of Gould, J., and Hotham, B., that if they thought otherwise, yet, as it appeared that the prisoner's conduct towards his apprentice was highly blameable and improper, they might, under all these circumstances, find him guilty of manslaughter; which they accordingly did. (o) And upon the question being afterwards put to the Judges, whether the verdict were well found, they all agreed that the prisoner should be burned in the hand and discharged. (p) taken, is evidently different from another report (g) of the opinion of the Judges in this case, from whence it might be collected, that there could be no gradation of guilt in a matter of this sort, where a master, by his ill-conduct or negligence, had occasioned or accelerated the death of his apprentice, but that he must either be found guilty of murder or acquitted; a conclusion which, whether well or ill founded, certainly cannot be drawn from this statement of the case. The same opinion, however, is stated in the Old Bailey Sessions Papers, to have been thrown out by the Recorder in Wade's case. (r)

pike trustees.

Where an inquisition alleged that the defendants were trustees under an Act of Parliament, and that it was their duty to contract for the repair of a road, and also to repair the road, and that they did feloniously neglect to contract for the reparation of the said road, and did feloniously neglect to repair the same, and that W. B., being riding in a barrow along the said road, the defendants by their neglect to contract for the reparation of the said road, and by their neglect to repair the same, did cause one wheel of the said barrow to fall into a large hole in the said road, and the said W. B. to be thereby thrown with great violence from the said barrow upon the ground, whereby he was killed: it was held that the inquisition was bad: not only must the neglect, to make a party guilty of it liable to the charge of felony, be personal, but the death must be the immediate result of that personal neglect, and here the death was not the direct consequence of the neglect charged. (s)

Persons following their common occupations.

Where persons employed about such of their lawful occupations, from whence danger may probably arise to others, neglect the ordinary cautions, it will be manslaughter, at least, on account of such negligence. (t) Thus, if workmen throw stones, rubbish, or other things from a house, in the ordinary course of their business, by which a person underneath happens to be killed, if they did not look out and give timely warning to such as might be below, and there was even a small probability of persons passing by, it will be manslaughter. (u) It was a lawful act, but done in an improper manner. It has, indeed, been said, that if this be done in the streets of London, or other populous towns, it will be manslaughter, notwithstanding such caution used. (v) But this must be understood with some limitation. If it be done early in the morning, when few or no people are stirring, and the ordinary caution be used, the party may be excusable; but when the streets are full, such ordinary caution will not suffice: for, in the hurry and noise of a crowded street, few people hear the warning, or sufficiently attend to it. slaughter. Upon an indictment for the manslaughter of a child, it appeared that the child being ill, the mother sent to a chemist for a pennyworth of paregoric; the chemist's apprentice delivered a phial, with a paregoric label on it, but with laudanum in it; and the mother, supposing it to be paregoric, gave the child six or seven drops, which killed it. The laudanum bottle and the paregoric bottle stood side by side. Bayley, J., told the jury: — 'If you think there was negligence on the part of the prisoner, you will find him guilty; if not, you must acquit him.' (x)

If a person adopts a mode of raising casks over a street, which is reasonably sufficient, and death ensues from the fall of a cask, he is not guilty of manslaughter. The prisoner was indicted for manslaughter, in having, by negligence in the manner of slinging a cask, caused the same to fall and kill two females, who were passing along the causeway. It appeared that there were three modes of slinging casks customary in Liverpool: one by slings passed round each end of the cask; a second by can hooks; and a third in the manner in which the prisoner had slung the cask, which caused the accident — namely, by a single rope round the centre of the cask. The cask was hoisted up to the fourth story of a warehouse, and on being pulled endways towards the door, it slipped from the rope as soon as it touched the floor of the room. Parke, J., told the jury: — 'The double slings are undoubtedly the safest mode; but, if you think that the mode which the prisoner adopted was reasonably sufficient, you cannot convict him.' (y)

Where the prisoner, who was an ironfounder, was employed to make twelve cannons, to celebrate the passing of the Reform Bill, and four of them were sent home and tried, and one of them burst under the touch-hole, and was sent back to the prisoner, with orders to have it melted up; but the prisoner returned it nailed down to a carriage, and there was some lead in it, which must have been put there to stop up the part which had burst, as it matched the former aperture; and the cannon, being loaded not heavier than usual, burst, and thereby killed the deceased, it was held that the prisoner was guilty of manslaughter. (z)

The prisoner had a firework-shop in the Westminster Road, where he had for some time carried on openly the business of selling fireworks. He had also a workshop at a neighbour's named Sunter, and a factory at Peckham. He supplied Vauxhall and Cremorne, under contracts, with considerable quantities of fireworks. He made and kept his stock at the factory at Peckham, and from thence he used to take the supply necessary for the gardens daily to the house in Westminster Road, where they used to be kept for two or three hours before they were taken to the gardens. In Sunter's room the smaller sort of rockets were made, excepting the heads for holding the stars. These heads were added at the shop in Westminster Road. At the house in Westminster Road fireworks were offered for sale. No fireworks were made there except as follows:—First, the finishing the smaller rockets, and making stars for them of combustible matter; secondly, making fireworks called serpents; thirdly, making cases and filling them with combustible matter, called red, blue, and green fires. (a) The fire was employed for filling coloured cases used to imitate revolving lights in fireworks called wheels. These cases affixed were not used by themselves, but in connection with those fireworks, to add to their effect. The contents of the cases of fire made at the Westminster Road were combustible, and the red fire would explode if struck hard. Five or six pounds of fire were made every day in the house in Westminster Road, and filled there in the back room into cases with a rammer and mallet by persons employed for the purpose. At the time of the fire there was a quantity of the red and blue fire in the house, in the room where it was to be put into cases, in order to be used in the course of the business, and a quantity of fireworks for the evening. The prisoner being out of the house and not personally interfering, a fire broke out in the red and blue fire, which communicated to the fireworks, causing a rocket to cross the street and set fire to a house, in which the deceased was consequently burnt to death. The fire was accidental in the sense of not being wilful or designed. It did not happen through any personal interference or negligence of the prisoner; and he is entitled to the benefit of any distinction between its happening through negligence of his servants, or by pure accident without any such negligence. It was contended that there was no case, as the cases of red, &c. fire, were only parts of the fireworks, and not within the 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 7; that it did not appear that it was by reason of making the fireworks that the mischief happened, and that the death was not the direct and immediate result of any wrong or omission on the prisoner's part. Willes, J. held that the prisoner was guilty of a misdemeanor in doing an act with intent to do what was forbidden by the statute, and that, as the fire was occasioned by such misdemeanor, and without it would not have taken place, or could not have been of such a character as to cause the death, a case was made out; but, upon a case reserved, the conviction was held wrong. Cockburn, C. J.: 'The keeping of the fireworks in the shop by the prisoner caused the death only by the superaddition of the negligence of some one else. By the negligence of the prisoner's servants the fireworks ignited, and the house in which the deceased was, was set on fire and death ensued. The keeping of the fireworks may be a nuisance; and if, from the unlawful act of the prisoner, death had ensued as a necessary and immediate consequence, the conviction might be upheld. The keeping of the fireworks, however, did not alone cause the death: plus that act of the prisoner there was the negligence of the prisoner's servants.' (b)

(a) To this last part of the business the particular attention of the Judges was directed.

(b) Reg. v. Bennett, Bell C. C. 1. The case stated that the question of a nuisance, independent of the statute, was disposed of upon the facts in favour of the prisoner. Not a single authority or case was referred to in the argument, or by the Court: and this case seems deserving of reconsideration. The death would not have happened except for the unlawful act of the prisoner; for, unless the combustibles had been where they were, the death would not have occurred. If they had spontaneously ignited, or a stranger had accidentally ignited them by striking his nailed boots on the floor, it cannot be doubted that the prisoner would have been guilty of manslaughter; but it is said that the negligence of the servant exonerates the master. It is submitted that, in point of law, it has no such effect. A master may be criminally responsible for

If a person driving a cart or other carriage, happen to kill another, and it appears that he might have seen the danger, but did not look before him, it will be manslaughter, for want of due circumspection. (c) Upon this subject the following case is reported:—A. was driving a cart with four horses, in the highway at Whitechapel; and he being in the cart, and the horses upon a trot, they threw down a woman, who was going the same way, with a burthen upon her head, and killed her. Holt, C. J., Tracy, J., Baron Bury, and the Recorder Lovel, held this to be only misadventure. But by Holt, C. J., if it had been in a street where people usually pass, it had been manslaughter. (d) But upon this case the following observations have been made:—‘It must be taken for granted from this note of the case, that the accident happened in a highway, where people did not usually pass; for otherwise the circumstance of the driver’s being in his cart, and going so much faster than is usual for carriages of that construction, savoured much of negligence and impropriety; for it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to stop the course of the horses suddenly, in order to avoid any person who could not get out of the way in time. And, indeed, such conduct, in a driver of such heavy carriages, might, under most circumstances, be thought to betoken a want of due care, if any, though but few, persons might probably pass by the same road. The greatest possible care is not to be expected, nor is it required: but whoever seeks to excuse himself for having unfortunately occasioned, by any act of his own, the death of another, ought at least to show that he took that care to avoid it, which persons in similar situations are accustomed to do.’ (e)

It is the duty of every man who drives a carriage to drive it with such care and caution as to prevent, as far as is in his power, any injury to any person. And if death be caused to any person, by the rapidity of the driving, it is no answer that the driver called out to the deceased to get out of the way, which the deceased might have done if he had not been in a state of intoxication. On an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the prisoner was driving a cart drawn by two horses, without reins; the horses were cantering, and the prisoner was sitting in front of the cart; on seeing the deceased, he called to him twice to get out of the way, but from the state he was in, and the rapid pace of the horses, he could not do so, and one of the cart wheels passed over him, and he was killed; it was held, that if a man drive a cart at an unusually rapid pace, whereby a person is killed, though he calls repeatedly to such person to get out of the way, if, from the rapidity of the driving, or from any other cause, the person cannot get out of the way time enough, but is killed, the driver is in law guilty of manslaughter; and that it is the duty of every man, who drives any carriage, to drive it with such care and caution as to prevent, as far as in his power, any accident or injury that may occur. (f)

A foot passenger is entitled to use the carriage-way, though there be a foot-path.

A foot passenger, though he may be infirm from disease, has a right to walk on the carriage-way, although there be a foot-path, and he is entitled to the exercise of reasonable care on the part of persons driving carriages along the carriage-way. (g) A tradesman was walking on a road, about two feet from the foot-path, after dark, but there were lamps at certain distances along the line of road, when the prisoner drove along in a cart drawn by one horse, at the rate of from eight to ten miles an hour, according to some witnesses, and of from six to seven miles an hour, according to other witnesses: the prisoner sat on some sacks, laid on the bottom of the cart, and he was near sighted. Other persons, who were walking along the same road, had with considerable difficulty got out of the way of the prisoner's cart. Bolland, B., told the jury, that the question was, whether the prisoner, having the care of the cart, and being a near-sighted man, conducted himself in such a way as not to put in jeopardy the limbs and lives of his Majesty's subjects. If they thought he had conducted himself properly, they would say he was not guilty; but if they thought that he acted carelessly and negligently, they would pronounce him guilty of manslaughter. (h)

Sitting in a cart.

If, in consequence of a person sitting in a cart, instead of being at the horse's head, or by its side, death is occasioned, such person is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, the evidence was, that the prisoner, being employed to drive a cart, sat in the inside instead of attending at the horse's head, and while he was sitting there, the cart went over a child, who was gathering up flowers on the road. Bayley, B., held, that the prisoner, by being in the cart, instead of at the horse's head, or by its side, was guilty of negligence; and death having been caused by such negligence, he was guilty of manslaughter. (i)

If the driver of a carriage urges his horses to such a pace, that he loses the command over them, and thereby death is occasioned, he is guilty of manslaughter. So, if the driver be racing with another carriage, and, from being unable to pull up his horses in time, his carriage is upset, and a person killed, the driver is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that there were two omnibuses, which were running in opposition to each other, galloping along a road, and that the prisoner was driving that on which the deceased

sat, and the witnesses for the prosecution stated that the prisoner was whipping his horses just before his omnibus upset. The defence was, that the horses in the omnibus driven by the prisoner took fright and ran away. Patteson, J. : ‘ The question is, whether you are satisfied that the prisoner was driving in such a negligent manner that, by reason of his gross negligence, he had lost the command of his horses; and that depends on whether the horses were unruly, or whether you believe that he had been racing with the other omnibus, and had so urged his horses that he could not stop them; because, however he might be endeavouring to stop them afterwards, if he had lost the command of them by his own act, he would be answerable: for a man is not to say, “ I will race along a road, and when I am got beyond another carriage I will pull up.” If the prisoner did really race, and only when he had got past the other omnibus endeavoured to pull up, he must be found guilty; but if you believe that he was run away with, without any act of his own, then he is not guilty. The main questions are, were the two omnibuses racing? and was the prisoner driving as fast as he could, in order to get past the other omnibus? and had he urged his horses to so rapid a pace, that he could not control them? If you are of that opinion you ought to convict him.’ (k)

Swindall and Osborne were indicted for the manslaughter of J. Durose. The prisoners, who were each driving a cart and horse, were seen two miles and a half from the place where the deceased was killed. Swindall there paid the toll, not only for that night, but for having passed with Osborne through the same gate a day or two before. They then appeared to be intoxicated. They were next seen at a bridge, over which they passed at a gallop, the one cart close behind the other. A person there told them to mind their driving; this was 990 yards from the place where the deceased was killed. They were next seen forty-seven yards beyond the place where the deceased was killed. The carts were then going at a quick trot, one closely following the other. At a turnpike-gate a quarter of a mile from that place Swindall, who appeared all along to have been driving the first cart, told the toll-gate keeper, ‘ We have driven over an old man; ’ and desired him to bring a light, and look at the name on the cart, on which Osborne pushed on his cart, and told Swindall to hold his bother, and they then started off at a quick pace. They were subsequently seen at two other places, at one of which Swindall said he had sold his concern to Osborne. The carts were loaded with pots from the Potteries. The surgeon stated that the deceased had a mark on his body, which would correspond with the wheel of a cart, and also several other bruises, and although he could not say that both carts had passed over the body, it was possible that both might have done so. For the prosecution it was contended, that it was perfectly immaterial in point of law whether one or both carts had passed over the deceased. The prisoners were in company, and had concurred in jointly driving furiously along the road; that was an unlawful act, and as both had joined in it, each was responsible for the consequences, though they might arise from the act of the other. For the prisoners it was urged that the evidence only proved that one of the prisoners ran over the deceased, and that the other was entitled to be acquitted. Pollock, C. B.: 'I think that is not so. I think the counsel for the Crown is right in his law. If two persons are in this way inciting each other to do an unlawful act, and one of them runs over a man, whether he be the first or the last, he would be equally liable. The person who runs over the man would be a principal in the first degree, and the other a principal in the second degree.' And in summing up, Pollock, C. B., said: 'The prisoners are charged with contributing to the death of the deceased by their negligence and improper conduct; and if they did so, it matters not whether he was deaf, or drunk, or negligent, or in part contributed to his own death; for in this consists a great distinction between civil and criminal proceedings. If two coaches run against each other, and the drivers of both are to blame, neither of them has any remedy for damages against the other. But in the case of loss of life, the law takes a totally different view; for there each party is responsible for any blame that may ensue, however large the share may be; and so highly does the law value human life, that it admits of no justification wherever life has been lost, and the carelessness or negligence of any one person has contributed to the death of another person.' And his Lordship then directed the jury on the other point in the manner above mentioned. (1)

case.

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the two prisoners were in a partial state of intoxication, and drove a gig along a road at a very rapid pace, and met three men, and at that time they were driving rapidly down a hill, the top of which was thickly shaded with trees, and when the three men got to the trees they found the deceased lying insensible in the middle of the road, presenting all the appearance of having just been run over by some vehicle, and he shortly afterwards died. He had been deaf from his childhood, and had contracted an inveterate habit of walking at all hours in the middle of the road, though he had been frequently warned of the probable consequences of doing so. It was contended that the prisoners ought to be acquitted, as the deceased had contributed to his own death. Rolfe, B.: 'Whatever may have been the negligence of the deceased, I am clearly of opinion that the prisoners would not be thereby exonerated from the consequences of their own illegal acts, which would be traced to their negligent conduct, if any such existed. I am of opinion, that if anyone should drive so rapidly along a great thoroughfare leading to a large town, as to be unable to avoid running over any pedestrian who may happen to be in the middle of the road, it is that degree of negligence in the conduct of a horse and gig which amounts to an illegal act in the eye of the law, and, if death ensues from the injuries then inflicted, the parties driving are guilty of manslaughter, even though considerable blame may be attributed to the deceased.' 'There is a very wide distinction between a civil action for pecuniary compensation for death arising from alleged negligence and a proceeding by way of indictment for manslaughter. The latter is a charge imputing criminal negligence, amounting to illegality; and there is no balance of blame in charges of felony; but wherever it appears that death has been occasioned by the illegal act of another, that other is guilty of manslaughter in point of law, though it may be that he ought not to be severely punished. If the jury should be of opinion that the prisoners were driving along the road at too rapid a pace, considering the time and place, and were conducting themselves in a careless and negligent way in the management of the horse and gig, I am of opinion that such conduct amounts to illegality, and that the prisoners must be found guilty on this indictment, whatever may have been the negligence of the deceased himself.' (m)

Upon a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was standing up in a spring cart; the reins were not in his hands, but lying on the horse's back; while the horse was trotting down a hill with the cart, the deceased, a child about three years old, ran across the road before the horse, and the wheel of the cart knocked it down and killed it. It did not appear that the prisoner saw the child before the accident. Erle, J., told the jury, that if the prisoner had had the reins, and by using them could have saved the child, he was guilty of manslaughter; but if they thought he could not have saved the child by pulling the reins or otherwise by their assistance, they must acquit him. (n)

Dalloway's case.

Where on an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the deceased was knocked down by a car driven by the prisoner, and great numbers were in the streets at the time: Perrin, J., told the jury, that this unusual concourse of people, instead of offering any extenuation for the prisoner, or diminishing the criminality of his careless driving, if they found it to have been such, would but be a circumstance to add to it, and that it was his duty, as well as of all driving upon such occasions, to take more than ordinary precautions against accidents, and to use more than ordinary diligence for the safety of the public. (o)

Murray's case.

A person driving a carriage is not bound to keep on the ordinary side of the road; but if he do not do so, he is bound to use more care and diligence, and keep a better look-out, that he may avoid any concussion, than would be requisite if he were to confine himself to his proper side of the road. (p)

If a person, riding in an improper and furious way along a road, cause the death of a person, it is manslaughter; but if two persons be riding in such an improper way, and death be caused by the second after the first has passed, the first is not responsible. A. and B. were riding on horseback, at a very rapid pace along a highway; the deceased, who was also on horseback, drew off his horse as far from the middle of the road as the place would allow: A. passed by him without any accident; but B.'s horse and the horse of the deceased came in collision, and both the deceased and Patteson, J.: 'I think that if two are riding fast, and one of them goes by without doing any injury to anyone, he is not answerable because the other, riding equally fast, rides against some one, and kills him. A., therefore, must be acquitted. If you think that B. was riding in an improper and furious way, and rode against the deceased, he is guilty of manslaughter; but if you think that the deceased's horse was unruly, and got into the way, you ought to acquit.' The same rule applies to navigating a river as to travelling on a road.

Those who navigate a river improperly, either by too much speed, or by negligent conduct, are as much liable, if death ensues, as those who cause it on a public highway, either by furious driving, or by negligent conduct. An inquisition charged that the prisoner did 'propel and force' a vessel against a skiff, whereby the deceased was drowned. The counsel for the prosecution, in opening the case, said, that he apprehended that the rule as to traversing the river Thames was the same as that applicable to the mode of passing along any of the Queen's common highways; therefore, if the speed at which, or the manner in which, the prisoners were navigating the vessel, and were proceeding before they saw the skiff, was such as to prevent them, after they did see it, from stopping in time to prevent mischief to the person in it, they would be responsible for the offence of manslaughter, if his death happened in consequence; if, on a misty night, the prisoners were proceeding at such a rate that they could not stop in time, their so proceeding was illegal, and, as death ensued, they were responsible. Parke, B.: 'You have stated the law most correctly. There is no doubt that those who navigate the Thames improperly, either by too much speed, or by negligent conduct, are as much liable, if death ensues, as those who cause it on a public highway, either by furious driving or negligent conduct.' (r)

Pilot navigating a foreign vessel.

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was a pilot, and was on board a Portuguese barque sailing down the Thames; the barque was manned entirely by Portuguese, who did not understand English or nautical directions. The deceased was shrimping in a small boat, and while such occupation is going on the boat is kept motionless by the shrimp net. When the barque was about a quarter of a mile distant the boat made a signal to her, and when she was within twenty yards the deceased hailed her. The prisoner called to the Portuguese helmsman to turn the vessel to the starboard, but the helmsman, not understanding the prisoner's directions, steered to the larboard; the barque struck the deceased and killed him. Lord Denman, C. J., after consulting Alderson, B., told the jury: 'The law is, that if the prisoner has produced the death by any conduct of his, he is guilty of manslaughter. It appears to me that he was the person guiding and directing the vessel, and that he is responsible for its management. It is extremely unfortunate that he did not, in the first instance, make the foreigners understand such simple directions as starboard and larboard. You will consider whether there was some negligence upon the part of the prisoner in not making the foreigners understand thoroughly. I take your opinion whether he was guilty of negligence in this respect, and whether that negligence caused the death. If you think so, you will find him guilty.' (s)

In order to convict the captain of a steamer of manslaughter in causing a death by running down another vessel, there must be some act of personal misconduct or personal negligence shown on his part. The captain and pilot of a steamer were indicted for manslaughter in causing a death by running down a smack, and it appeared that at the time the steamer started there was a man forward in the fore-castle to keep a look-out, but at the time when the accident happened, which was about an hour afterwards, the captain and pilot were both on the bridge which communicates between the paddle-boxes; the night was dark, and it was raining hard; the steamer had a light at each end of the topsail yard; an oyster smack, on board which the deceased was, was coming up the Thames without any light on board; the deceased was below: a boy who was on board the smack stated that when the steamer struck the smack he got on board the steamer, and found nobody forward; other witnesses were present to show that no person was forward on the look-out at the time. Park, J. A. J.: 'Then the captain is not responsible in felony; it is the fault of the person who ought to be there, and who may have disobeyed orders; if the captain leaves the pilot on the paddle-box, as he did here, he is not criminally responsible. In a criminal case every man is answerable for his own acts; there must be some personal act; these persons may be civilly responsible.' Alderson, B., 'If you could show that there was a man at the bow, and that the captain had said, "Come away, it's no matter about looking out," that would be an act of misconduct on his part. If you can show that the death of the deceased was the result of any act of personal misconduct on the part of the captain, you may convict him.' Park, J. A. J., 'Supposing he had put a man there, and had gone to lie down, and the man had walked away, do you mean to say he would be criminally responsible? And you must carry it to that length, if you mean to make anything of it.' Alderson, B., 'I think this case has arrived at its termination; there is no act of personal misconduct or personal negligence on the part of these persons at the bar.' (t)

To make the captain of a vessel guilty of manslaughter in causing a person to be drowned, by running down a boat, the prosecutor must show some act done by the captain; and a mere omission on his part, in not doing the whole of his duty, is not sufficient: but if there be sufficient light, and the captain of a

Quere, whether this case amounts to more than this: that the captain had placed a proper person forward, who had left his post without the captain perceiving it? In opening the case, Ryland said, the question will be whether there was a sufficiently cautious and careful look-out kept by the people on board the steamer. Alderson, B., 'You put it as a case of a negligent act of omission. I have great doubt whether that amounts to manslaughter; not keeping a good look-out is a negligent act of omission.' Ryland, 'The steering in a particular and improper direction, in consequence of not keeping a good look-out, is an act of commission.' Alderson, B., 'It may be; but it is very difficult to make felony out of a negligent act of omission, unless the party is bound by law to do the act omitted, as providing food for a person of tender years.' At the conclusion of the case a jurymen asked, 'Is the captain bound to have a person on the look-out?' Alderson, B., 'Civilly he is, but not criminally.' See ante, p 750. Fost. 322.

steamer is either at the helm, or in a situation to be giving the command, and does that which causes the injury, he is guilty of manslaughter. Upon an indictment against the captain of a steamer for manslaughter in causing a death by running down a boat, the counsel for the prosecution, in opening the case, said, if a party engaged in a lawful occupation is guilty of wilful misconduct, or of gross negligence, it is manslaughter. Park, J.A.J., 'You must show some act done; you rather state it as if a mere omission on the part of the prisoner in not doing the whole of his duty would be enough: and we are of opinion that is not sufficient. I have no hesitation in saying, that if there was sufficient light, and the captain himself was at the helm, or in a situation to be giving the command, and did that which caused the accident, he would be guilty of manslaughter.' Alderson, B., 'There must be some personal act. In the case of a coach, the coachman is driving animals, and in the case of the captain, he is governing reasonable beings.' It appeared in evidence that the deceased and two other persons were in a small boat going down the river, when a small steamer used for towing, of which the prisoner was master, met them, and, notwithstanding their shouting, struck the boat, and nearly cut it in two, in consequence of which the deceased was drowned; the waterman proved that he and the captain were on the starboard side of the winlass, and two other men were on the larboard side; that the captain did not leave his place once, and the mate was at the helm, and remained there till after the accident; that the engine was all open, and worked on deck, and made a great noise; that he did not hear the shouting in time to do anything to avert the accident. Park, J. A. J., 'This case has come to its end; at the outside it can only be considered as one of those accidents which will happen in a river navigation; it appears that they kept a proper look-out; there were several persons on deck at the time.' (u)

Insufficient statement of the duty to work a steam engine.

Where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the prisoner was employed to superintend and keep in motion the working of an engine at a colliery for pumping out the water from the colliery, and thereby keeping a clear course for the passage of air and the dispersing of foul air, and that the prisoner neglected to superintend and keep in motion the working of the engine, and did thereby prevent a clear course being left for the passage of the air, and did cause noxious gases to accumulate, and then went on to state that an explosion took place and death ensued; it was proved that there was an old and new mine, and between the two there was a passage for the air from the old to the new mine, and in the old mine there was an engine which was used for the purpose of pumping the water out of that mine, in order that the passage between the two mines might be kept clear, and the prisoner, an engineer, had been employed to work this engine, but he had absented himself from his duty for three days, during which the engine did not work, and the consequence was that the water collected in, and prevented the air from circulating through, the passage between the mines, thereby occasioning an accumulation of foul air, which exploded and caused the death. It was objected that the charge in the indictment was no more than a nonfeasance, and did not disclose any act of misfeasance; and that acts of mere nonfeasance did not make a man criminally responsible. (v) Wightman, J., was of opinion that the facts as charged did not constitute an indictable offence, observing that the indictment contained no direct allegation that it was the duty of the prisoner to do that which he was alleged to have neglected to do. (w)

An indictment for manslaughter alleged that it was the duty of the prisoner to cause to be ventilated a coal mine, and to cause it to be kept free from noxious gases, and that the prisoner feloniously omitted to cause the mine to be ventilated, and that noxious gases accumulated and exploded, whereby the deceased was killed. It appeared that the deceased was killed by the explosion of fire-damp in a colliery, of which the prisoner was a sort of manager, and it was imputed on the part of the prosecution that this explosion would have been prevented if the prisoner had caused an air-heading to have been put up, as it was his duty to have done. For the defence it was attempted to be proved that it was the duty of one of the persons killed to have reported to the prisoner that an air-heading was required, and that he had not done so. In summing up, Maule, J., said, 'The questions for you to consider are, whether it was the duty of the prisoner to have directed an air-heading to be made in this mine; and whether, by his omitting to do so, he was guilty of a want of reasonable and ordinary precaution. If you are satisfied that it was the plain and ordinary duty of the prisoner to have caused an air-heading to be made in this mine, and that a man using reasonable diligence would have done it, and that, by the omission, the death of the deceased occurred, you ought to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. It has been contended that some other persons were, on this occasion, also guilty of neglect; still, assuming that to be so, their neglect will not excuse the prisoner; for if a person's death be occasioned by the neglect of several, they are all guilty of manslaughter; and it is no defence for one, who was negligent, to say that another was negligent also, and thus, as it were, to try to divide the negligence among them.' (x)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was an engineer, and his duty was to manage a steam engine employed for the purpose of drawing up miners from a coal pit; and when the skip containing the men arrived at the pit's mouth his duty was to stop the revolution of the windlass, so that the men might get out. On the day in question he deserted his post, leaving the engine in charge of an ignorant boy, who, before the prisoner went away, declared himself to the prisoner to be utterly incompetent to manage such a steam engine as the one intrusted to him. The prisoner neglected this warning, and threatened the boy, in case he refused to do as he was ordered. The boy superintended the raising of two skips from the pit with success; but on the arrival at the pit's mouth of a third, containing four men, he was unable to stop the engine, and the skip being drawn over the pulley, one of the men was thrown down

If the manager of a mine neglect to do an act, which it is his plain and ordinary duty to do, and thereby death ensues, he is guilty of manslaughter, and it is no defence that others also by their neglect contributed to cause the death.

A man may by a neglect of duty render himself guilty of manslaughter, or even of murder.

the shaft of the pit, and killed on the spot. The engine could not be stopped, 'in consequence of the slipper being too low,' an error which any competent engineer could have rectified, but which the boy in charge of the engine could not. For the prisoner it was contended that a mere omission or neglect of duty could not render a man guilty of manslaughter. (y) Lord Campbell, C. J., 'I am clearly of opinion that a man may, by a neglect of duty, render himself liable to be convicted of manslaughter, or even of murder.' (z)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was a banksman at the top of a shaft of a colliery, where there was an engine and ropes to send down bricks and materials in a bucket, and draw up the empty baskets. It was his duty to send down materials, and to superintend the proper letting down of the buckets, and to place the stage hereafter mentioned. The buckets were run on a truck on to a movable stage over half of the area of the top of the shaft, and there the bucket was attached and lowered down, the stage being removed. The prisoner on the occasion in question had omitted to put or cause to be put the stage on the mouth of the shaft, and in the absence of the stage a bucket with a truck and bricks ran along the tram-road, into the shaft, fell down the pit, and killed the deceased. It did not appear that the prisoner was directing or driving the waggon at the time. It was left to the jury to say whether the accident happened by negligence of the prisoner, and whether that negligence arose from an act of omission or commission, and they found that the death arose from the negligent omission of the prisoner in not putting the stage on the mouth of the pit; and, upon a case reserved, Lord Campbell, C. J., delivered judgment: 'We are of opinion that this conviction ought to be affirmed. It was the duty of the prisoner to place the stage on the mouth of the shaft; the death of the deceased was the direct consequence of the omission of the prisoner to perform this duty; if the prisoner, of malice aforethought, and with a premeditated design of causing the death of the deceased, had omitted to place the stage on the mouth of the shaft, and the death of the deceased had thereby been caused, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder. According to the common law form of an indictment for murder by reason of the omission of a duty, it was necessary that the indictment should allege that it was the duty of the prisoner to do the act, or to state facts from which the law would infer this duty. (a) But it has never been doubted that if death is the direct consequence of the malicious omission of the

(z) Reg. v. Lowe, 3 C. & K. 123. Lord Campbell discussed this case with the Editor, and they fully concurred that a man might render himself equally culpable by neglecting to do his duty as by a wilful act. E.g. It is the duty of a pointsman to turn the switches on the approach of a train, and he wilfully neglects to do so, whereby an accident happens and a man is killed; another man wilfully turns some points with which he has nothing to do, and a death occurs; the offence of the one is precisely the same as that of the other. A man who wilfully neglects to feed his infant child is just as guilty of murder as if he poisoned it. Indeed, it has been truly said, that 'between wilful mischief and gross negligence the boundary line is hard to trace; I should rather say, impossible. The law runs them into each other, considering such a degree of negligence as some proof of malice,' per Lord Denman, C. J. Lynch v. Nordin, 1 Q. B. 29.

performance of a duty (as of a mother to nourish her infant child), this is a case of murder. If the omission was not malicious, and arose from negligence only, it is a case of manslaughter. It has been held, that to make the captain of a vessel guilty of manslaughter in causing a person to be drowned by running down a boat, proof of a mere omission on his part to do the whole of his duty is not sufficient. (b) But there is no authority for the position, that without an act of commission there can be no manslaughter; and, on the contrary, the general doctrine seems well established, that what constitutes murder, being by design and of malice prepense, constitutes manslaughter where arising from culpable negligence.' (c)

The prisoner was a porter at the Brighton Station, and it was his duty to start the trains. It being an excursion day, three up trains came in succession, all of them late, so that none of them could be started at the proper time. There was a rule of the company, that under such circumstances no train should be started at intervals of less than five minutes after the preceding one. The case against the prisoner was that he had started the three trains so that there was only an interval of three or four minutes between the second and third. The first train arrived safely at the Clayton Tunnel (seven miles from Brighton), and passed safely through, and the man at the Brighton end of the tunnel, when it entered, telegraphed 'train in;' but, owing to some improper working of the signal at his end, became confused, and on the arrival of the second train, not feeling certain that he had received the signal which authorised him to send on the second train, again telegraphed 'train in' just as the second train had gone into the tunnel. Fearing that the signal might be misunderstood, he showed the red flag, which he supposed the second train had not seen, but which had the effect of pulling up the second train in the tunnel. He again telegraphed to ask 'is that train out?' upon which the man at the north end of the tunnel, supposing that this referred to the first train, telegraphed 'train out,' whereupon the porter at the Brighton end of the tunnel sent the third train into the tunnel, and this ran into the second, which had come to a standstill in consequence of seeing the red flag. Erle, C. J., is reported to have told the grand jury, that 'they must be satisfied before they found the bill that there was a prima facie case of such criminal negligence as had been the proximate and efficient cause of the catastrophe. The negligence imputed appeared to be the sending on one train after another in a shorter interval of time than, according to the rules, he ought have done. A mistake, indeed, was said to have arisen from the negligence of the defendant. Still, if the particular negligence imputed to the prisoner appeared not to have been the proximate cause of the catastrophe, the bill for manslaughter ought not to be found; and if it appeared that other causes had intervened, the prisoner's negligence would not have been the proximate and efficient cause of the deaths which had occurred. That this was in entire accordance with the authorities will appear from the most recent cases. The case is to be clearly distinguished from that of joint negligence. It is indeed well settled, that it is no defence in a case of manslaughter that the death was caused by the negligence of others as well as by that of the prisoner; for if the death of the deceased be caused partly by the negligence of others, the prisoner and all those others are guilty of manslaughter.' (d)

(d) Reg. v. Ledger, 2 F. & F. 557. Erle, C. J., then referred to Reg. v. Haines, supra, and Reg. v. Barrett, supra. The great importance of placing the culpability of railway officials in a clear light has caused the following remarks, in which the words 'neglect' and 'negligence' are always used as importing such a degree of culpability as, if death ensued from it, the offence would amount to manslaughter at least. First, then, a clear distinction exists between negligence and a wilful act—a distinction well illustrated by the numerous cases, in which the rule has been established, that a master is answerable for the negligent, but not for the wilful act of his servant. And it should seem that if a railway official deliberately starts a train in direct opposition to the orders he has received, this is a wilful act, and that, as it is an intentional violation of his duty, it ought to be considered precisely in the same light as if it were done by a person who had no authority whatever to interfere with the train. Next, where a train is started before its proper time, and it runs into another train and kills a person, it seems that, whether the starting of the train be considered as a wilful or negligent act, the starter of the train is guilty of manslaughter. If the accident would not have happened if the train had not been started till its proper time, the case seems clear from doubt; for there the too early starting of the train is manifestly the cause of the death; and supposing the accident would have happened had the train been started at the proper time, still the death was caused at the time when it occurred by the culpable conduct of the starter of the train; in other words, the death arose from the culpable act of the starter of the train, and sooner than it otherwise would have done, and the case seems to be very similar to those where the death of a person is accelerated by violence (ante, p. 702), and which establish the principle, that if a man is caused by a wrongful act to die at any time earlier than he otherwise would have done, it is a case of manslaughter, and if the accelerating the death of a sick man be such an offence, it is not easy to suggest a reason why the accelerating the death of a healthy man is not so also. It must also be observed, that in such a case all that is certain is what has actually happened; it is mere speculation what might have happened if the train had been started at its proper time: the mere shifting of the deceased from one seat to another might have saved his life. Nor is it any excuse that the train which was run into was met with at a place at which it would not have been but for the wilful or negligent act of some other person: the answer to this excuse is, that the time for starting having been fixed expressly for the purpose of preventing the possibility of such accidents, whether they might arise from the preceding train being met with on the line through negligence or otherwise, it does not lie in the starter's mouth to excuse his own wrongful act by such a wilful or negligent act of another. Lastly, it is submitted that the clear rule of law is, that everyone who contributes by his wilful or negligent act to the death of a man is guilty of manslaughter, although there be no community of purpose or action between them, and although the act of the one may be proximate to, and the acts of the others remote, from the immediate cause of death; and that the only correct question in these cases is, whether the act did in any way whatever contribute to the death. In Reg. v. Haines, the prisoner's duty was to cause an air-bell to be put in a mine; and it was alleged to be the duty of another person to report to the prisoner that an air-bell was wanting—two such totally different duties, that the neglect of either could not possibly be the joint neglect of the two parties. Now Maule, J., said, 'It has been contended that some other persons were also guilty of neglect; still, assuming that to be so, their neglect will not excuse the prisoner, for if a person's death be occasioned by the neglect of several, they are all guilty of manslaughter; and it is no defence for one who was negligent to say that another was negligent also, and thus, as it were, try to divide the negligence among them.' This decision is directly against there being any limitation to joint negligence or proximate negligence, and, as far as it goes, entirely supports the position above laid down. Suppose three railway officials each negligently turned three different sets of points at A, B, and C., and that the result was an accident and death, it is submitted that all of them would be guilty of manslaughter, provided the act of each contributed in any degree to the accident. So again, suppose A. and B. each negligently turned the points for two different trains, so that the trains were caused thereby to run into each other, can it admit of doubt that both would be responsible for the result? In Reg. v. Barrett, ante, p. 875, the decision turned on the defect in the indictment, which, being in the old form, contained no alle-

Where on a trial for manslaughter it was stated that the deceased was the stoker on board a steam tug, of which the prisoners were the captain and engineman; the steam tug had exploded and killed the deceased whilst the prisoners, with the deceased, were the only persons on board. It was afterwards discovered that the lever of the safety valve was so tied down by weights that it could not act as a safety valve. There was therefore considerably more pressure on the boiler plates than they could bear. There was a government valve, one of the keys to the lock of which was kept by a government inspector, and the other ought to have been in possession of the captain; but there was no proof that he had the key at the time of the explosion. It was afterwards found that this valve was in such a state that it could not work. If it had been working, no mischief could have occurred. At the time of the explosion the tug was racing with a steamer, and had been so for some time. Against the captain it was urged that he had the control of the tug, and that he was guilty of culpable neglect in not seeing that the government valve was put into working order, or in allowing the other valve to be in a state in which it could not work. As to the engineer, it was his duty to attend to the working of the engine, and he was bound to see that too much steam was not generated. Hill, J., held that there was no case for a conviction. There was a difficulty to show that either of the prisoners were in a position to see that the government valve was out of order; and there was nothing inconsistent with the assumption that the deceased himself could see it to be out of order; and it was perfectly possible that he might have put the valve in order without the intervention of either of the prisoners; if so, it was clear that a felony could not be made out. (e)

Explosion of a steam tug.

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that thirteen persons embarked in a boat, besides two watermen, of whom the prisoner was one; two witnesses proved, that by the swell of a steamer in motion the boat was carried against the bows of another steamer, and that as soon as it struck the prisoner called out to the passengers to sit still, but they all jumped up and tried to lay hold of the steamer, and in consequence the boat was upset. Had the passengers remained quiet, the witnesses believed the accident would not have happened. Another witness was of opinion that the fault lay in the prisoner's pushing off the boat from the stairs with one of the oars, he standing upright at the time, instead of being seated and having the command of the skulls; he ought to have known the danger under such circumstances of crossing the strong tide that rushed through the arch of the bridge; but for his pushing off as he did, the boat would have cleared the steamer. He thought the same thing might have happened to the boat if there had been only three persons in it or only one. Williams, J.: 'If the circumstance of the passengers jumping up really caused gation that it was the prisoner's duty to do that which he was alleged to have neglected to do. See also Reg. v. Swindall, ante, p. 870; and Reg. v. Longbottom, ante, p. 871, as to the negligence of the deceased forming no excuse.

the accident, the overloading of the boat was immediately productive of such a result, and thus the prisoner is answerable; for he should have contemplated the danger of such a thing happening. If the fact of the prisoner standing up in the boat was the cause of the catastrophe, then it may be gross negligence on his part to have done so; because he is supposed to be acquainted with the force and velocity of the tide, and the danger of crossing it under the circumstances. On the whole, it is a question for the jury, whether the deceased met his death either by the gross carelessness of the prisoner in the management of the boat, or in taking on board a greater number of passengers than it was capable of safely carrying.' (f)

There is one species of criminal negligence, punishable by the provisions of the statute law, which may be mentioned in this place, though the offence is not made manslaughter. By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 75 (local and personal), s. 38, in case any greater number of persons or passengers shall be taken or carried in any such wherry, boat, or other vessel (mentioned in the Act) on the river Thames (within the limits there mentioned), than are respectively allowed to be carried therein, and any one or more of them shall by reason thereof be drowned, every person or persons who shall work or navigate such wherry, &c., offending therein, and being convicted, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to punishment, as in cases of misdemeanor, at the discretion of the Court, and shall also be disfranchised, and not allowed to work or navigate any wherry, &c., or to enjoy any of the privileges of a freeman of the company of watermen, &c., on the river Thames. SEC. VI.

Indictment.

THE indictment for manslaughter differs from the indictment for the higher crime of murder, in the omission of any statement as to malice, and of the conclusion that the party accused did kill and 'murder;' and we have seen that a bill of indictment for murder may be converted into one for manslaughter, by striking out such statement and conclusion. (h)

Manslaughter.

By the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 5, 'Whosoever shall be convicted of manslaughter shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, - or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, (i) or to pay

(f) Reg. v. Williamson, 1 Cox, C. C. 97, Gurney, B. and Williams, J. It was also held that the fact of no number being painted on the boat was prima-facie evidence that the boat was unlicensed.

(g) It was observed upon a former statute, 10 Geo. 2, c. 31, containing a more severe punishment for an offence of this kind, that it might serve as a caution to stage coachmen and others, who overload their carriages for the sake of lucre, to the great danger of the lives of the passengers, the number of whom are regulated by Act of Parliament. 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 38, p. 264, and see the provisions as to carrying too many passengers, in the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 120, s. 34.

Sec. 67. ‘In the case of every felony punishable under this Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable: and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act (except murder) shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and every accessory after the fact to murder shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour; and whosoever shall counsel, aid, or abet the commission of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, shall be liable to be proceeded against, indicted, and punished as a principal offender.’ (l)

Punishment of principals in the second degree, and accessories.

Where a party is charged with manslaughter in causing the death of a person by negligence in the discharge of his duty, it must be proved that the negligent act was that of the party charged. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that it was the prisoner’s duty to attend to a steam engine, but on the occasion in question he had stopped the engine and gone away, and that, during his absence, a person came and put it in motion, and being unskilled was not able to stop it again, and in consequence of the engine being thus put in motion, the deceased was killed. Alderson, B., stopped the case, saying that the death was the consequence, not of the act of the prisoner, but of the person who set the engine in motion after the prisoner had gone away; that it is necessary, in order to a conviction for manslaughter, that the negligent act which causes the death should be that of the party charged. (m)

Evidence.

On a trial for manslaughter of a person who was burnt in a ship, where the prisoner had struck a light with a match, and lighted a candle, in a part of the ship forbidden by the ship’s regulations, and had thrown down the match before it was extinguished, but a period of six hours elapsed without sign of fire by sight or smell; Bramwell, B., thought the evidence too slight to justify a conviction. (n)

Where an indictment for manslaughter stated that the prisoner ‘did compel and force A. B. and C. D. to leave’ a windlass, by means of which the death was occasioned, and it appeared that the prisoner, who was working one handle of the windlass, went away, and A. B. and C. D., then finding they were not strong enough to hold the windlass without him, let go their hold, by reason of which the deceased was killed, it was held that the words ‘did compel and force’ must be taken to mean personal affirmative force applied to A. B. and C. D., and therefore the prisoner must be acquitted. (o) So where an indictment alleged that the

It has been held, upon two cases reserved, that a person indicted for murder may be convicted of manslaughter, and punished accordingly, although such indictment do not conclude contra formam statuti. (q) And so on an indictment for manslaughter not concluding contra formam statuti, the punishment provided by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 9, might be awarded, for such conclusion is only necessary where a statute creates the offence, not where it merely regulates the punishment. Accessories.

If a person be indicted as accessory after the fact to a murder, he may be convicted as accessory after the fact to manslaughter, if the offence of the principal turns out to be manslaughter. CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF EXCUSABLE AND JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

WE may now properly proceed to treat of such homicide as, not amounting even to manslaughter, must be considered either as excusable or justifiable: excusable when the person, by whom it is committed, is not altogether free from blame; and justifiable when no blame whatever is attached to the party killing.

Excusable homicide is of two sorts: either per infortunium, by misadventure; or se et sua defendendo, upon a principle of self-defence. The term excusable homicide imports some fault in the party by whom it has been committed; but of a nature so trivial that the law excuses such homicide from the guilt of felony, though in strictness it deems it to be deserving of some degree of punishment. It appears to be the better opinion, that the punishment inflicted for this offence was never greater than a forfeiture of the goods and chattels of the delinquent, or a portion of them: (a) and, from as early a time as our records will reach, a pardon and writ of restitution of the goods and chattels have been granted as a matter of right, upon payment of the expenses of suing them out. At the present time, in order to prevent this expense, it is usual for the Judges to permit or direct a general verdict of acquittal in cases where the death has notoriously happened by misadventure, or in self-defence. (b) There might, however, formerly have been cases so bordering upon, and not easily distinguishable from, manslaughter, that the offender might have been put to sue out his pardon, according to the provisions of the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1, c. 9; (c) but that statute was repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; and the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 7, enacts, that 'No punishment or forfeiture shall be incurred by any person who shall kill another by misfortune, or in his own defence, or in any other manner, without felony.'

Justifiable homicide is of several kinds: as it may be occasioned by the performance of acts of unavoidable necessity, where no shadow of blame can be attached to the party killing; or by acts done by the permission of the law, either for the advancement of public justice, or for the prevention of some atrocious crime.

SEC. I.

Of Excusable Homicide by Misadventure.

Persons doing a lawful act and happening to kill.

HOMICIDE by misadventure is where one doing a lawful act, without any intention of bodily harm, and using proper precaution to prevent danger, unfortunately happens to kill another person. (d) The act must be lawful; for if it be unlawful, the homicide will amount to murder, or manslaughter, as has been already shown: (e) and it must not be done with intention of great bodily harm; for then the legality of the act, considered abstractedly, would be no more than a mere cloak, or pretence, and consequently would avail nothing. The act must also be done in a proper manner, and with due caution to prevent danger. (f)

Persons following their common occupations.

Thus, if people, following their common occupations, use due caution to prevent danger, and nevertheless happen, unfortunately, to kill anyone, such killing will be homicide by misadventure. As if workmen throw stones, rubbish, or other things, from a house, in the ordinary course of their business, by which a person underneath happens to be killed, this will be misadventure only, if it were done in a retired place, where there was no probability of persons passing by, and none had been seen about the spot before, or if timely and proper warning were given (g) to such as might be below. (h) And the party will not be more criminal who is working with a hatchet, when the head of it flies off, and kills a by-stander. (i) So, where a person, driving a cart or other carriage, happens to drive over another and kill him, if the accident happened in such a manner that no want of due care could be imputed to the driver, it will be accidental death, and the driver will be excused. (k) A. was driving a cart with four horses in the highway at Whitechapel, he being in the cart; and the horses being upon a trot, threw down a woman who was going the same way with a burthen upon her head, and killed her. Holt, C. J., Tracy, J., Baron Bury, and the Recorder Lovell, held this to be only misadventure: but by Lord Holt, if it had been in a street where people usually pass, this had been manslaughter. (l) And, upon the same ground of no want of due care being imputable to the party, in a case where a person was riding a horse, and the horse, being whipt by some other person, sprang out of the road, and ran over a child and killed it, this was held to be misadventure only in the rider, though manslaughter in the person who whipped the horse. (m) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 29, s. 3.

As the degree of caution to be employed depends upon the probability of danger, it follows that persons using articles or instruments, in their nature peculiarly dangerous, must proceed with such appropriate and reasonable precaution as the particular circumstances may require. Thus, though where one lays poison to kill rats, and another takes it and dies, this is misadventure: yet it must be understood to have been laid in such manner and place as not easily to be mistaken for proper food; for that would betoken great inadvertence, and might in some cases amount to manslaughter. (n)

Persons using dangerous articles, or instruments.

A., having deer frequenting his corn field, out of the precinct of any forest or chase, set himself in the night-time to watch in a hedge, and set B., his servant, to watch in another corner of the field, with a gun charged with bullets, giving him orders to shoot, when he heard any bustle in the corn by the deer. The master afterwards improvidently rushed into the corn himself: and the servant, supposing it to be the deer, shot and killed the master. This was ruled to be misadventure, on the ground that the servant was misguided by his master's own direction, and was ignorant that it was anything else but the deer. It seemed, however, to the learned Judge who so decided, (o) that if the master had not given such direction, which was the occasion of the mistake, it would have been manslaughter, because of the want of due caution in the servant to shoot before he discovered his mark. (p) But upon this it has been remarked, that if, from all the other circumstances of the case, there appeared a want of due caution in the servant, it does not seem that the command of the master could supply it, much less could excuse him in doing an unlawful act: and that the excuse of having used ordinary caution can only be admitted where death happens accidentally in the prosecution of some lawful act. (q) By the same rule as to due caution being observed, it has been holden to be misadventure only, where a commander coming upon a sentinel in the night, in the posture of an enemy, to try his vigilance, is killed by him as such; the sentinel not being able to distinguish his commander, under such circumstances, from an enemy. (r)

But it should be observed, that the caution which the law requires, is not the utmost caution that can be used: it is sufficient that a reasonable precaution be taken; such as is usual and ordinary in similar cases; such as has been found, by long experience in the ordinary course of things, to answer the end. (s) This proper modification of the rule respecting caution does not appear to have been sufficiently attended to in the following case. A man found a pistol in the street, which he had reason to believe was not loaded, having tried it with the rammer: he carried it home, and showed it to his wife; and she standing before him, he pulled up the cock, and touched the trigger; and the pistol went off and killed the woman. This was ruled manslaughter. (t) But the legality of the decision has been doubted, on the ground that the man examined the pistol in the common way, and used the ordinary caution deemed to be effectual in similar cases. (u) And Mr. J. Foster, after stating his reasons for disapproving of the judgment, says, that he had been the longer upon the case, because accidents of this lamentable kind may be the lot of the wisest and best of mankind, and most commonly fall amongst the nearest friends and relations; and then proceeds to state a case of a similar accident, in which the trial was had before himself. Upon a Sunday morning, a man and his wife went a mile or two from home with some neighbours, to take a dinner at the house of their common friend. He carried his gun with him, hoping to meet with some diversion by the way: but before he went to dinner he discharged it, and set it up in a private place in his friend's house. After dinner he went to church; and in the evening, returned home with his wife and neighbours, bringing his gun with him, which was carried into the room where his wife was, she having brought it part of the way. He, taking it up, touched the trigger; and the gun went off and killed his wife, whom he dearly loved. It came out in evidence, that, while the man was at church, a person belonging to the family privately took the gun, charged it, and went after some game; but, before the service at church was ended, returned it, loaded, to the place whence he took it, and where the defendant, who was ignorant of all that had passed, found it, to all appearance, as he had left it. 'I did not inquire,' says Mr. J. Foster, 'whether the poor man had examined the gun before he carried it home; but being of opinion, upon the whole evidence, that he had reasonable grounds to believe that it was not loaded, I directed the jury, that if they were of the same opinion, they should acquit him: and he was acquitted.' (v)

As to the degree of caution which must be observed in the use of dangerous instruments,

foro domestico.

It has been shown, that where parents, masters, and other persons, having authority in foro domestico, give correction to those under their care, and such correction exceeds the bounds of due moderation, so that death ensues, the offence will be either murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances: (w) but if the correction be reasonable and moderate, and by the struggling of the party corrected, or by some other misfortune, death ensue, the killing will be only misadventure. (x)

But, quæ, whether the ordinary and proper precaution would not have been to have examined the pan, which in all probability must have been primed. The rammer of a pistol, or gun, is so frequently too short, from having been accidentally broken, that it would be very incautious in a person previously unacquainted with the state of the instrument to rely upon such proof as he could receive from the rammer, unless it were passed so smartly down the barrel as clearly to give the sound of the metal at the bottom. However, there is a quæ to the case in the margin of the report, and it appears that the learned Bidaar (Holt, C. J.) was not satisfied with the judgment; and that it is one of the points which, in the Preface, he recommends for further consideration.

by consent, are deemed lawful sports; and if either party happen to be killed in such sports, it is excusable homicide by misadventure. (y) A different doctrine, indeed, appears to have been laid down by a very learned Judge: (z) but the grounds of that doctrine have been ably combated by Mr. J. Foster, who gives this good reason for considering such sports as lawful, that bodily harm is not the motive on either side. (a) And certainly, though it cannot be said that they are altogether free from danger, yet they are very rarely attended with fatal consequences, and each party has friendly warning to be on his guard. Proper caution and fair play should, however, be observed; and, though the weapons used be not of a deadly nature, yet, if they may breed danger, there should be due warning given, that each party may start upon equal terms. For, if two be engaged to play at cudgels, and the one make a blow at the other, likely to hurt, before he is upon his guard, and without warning, from whence death ensues, the want of due and friendly caution will make such act amount to manslaughter, but not murder, the intent not being malicious. (b)

Where on a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner came into a shop and pulled a young lad by the hair off a cask where he was sitting, and put his arm round his neck and spun him round, and they came together out of the shop, and the prisoner kept spinning him round, and the lad broke away from him, and in consequence and at the moment of his so doing, the prisoner being intoxicated, reeled into the road, and against the deceased who was passing, and knocked her down, and she died shortly afterwards; and the lad said he did not resist the prisoner—he thought the prisoner was only playing with him, and was sure that it was intended as a joke throughout. Erle, J., told the jury: ‘Where the death of one person is caused by the act of another, while the latter is in pursuit of any unlawful object, the person so killing is guilty of manslaughter, although he had no intention whatever of injuring him who was the victim of his conduct. Here, however, there was nothing unlawful in what the prisoner did to this lad, and which led to the death of the woman. Had this treatment of the boy been against his will, the prisoner would have been committing an assault—an unlawful act—which would have rendered him amenable for any consequences resulting from it; but as everything that was done was with the boy’s consent, there was no assault, and consequently no illegality. It is in the eye of the law an accident, and nothing more.’ (c)

Ordinarily the weapons made use of upon such occasions are not deadly in their nature: but, in some sports, the instruments used are of a deadly nature; yet, in such cases, if they be not directed by the persons using them against each other, and therefore no danger be reasonably to be apprehended, the killing which may casually ensue will be only homicide by misadventure. Such will be the case, therefore, where persons shoot at game, or butts, or any other lawful object, and a bystander is killed: (d) and with respect to the lawfulness of shooting at game, it may be observed, that though the party be not qualified, the act will not be so unlawful as to enhance the accidental killing of a bystander to manslaughter. (e)

SEC. II.

Of Excusable Homicide in Self-Defence.

HOMICIDE in self-defence is a sort of homicide committed se et sua defendendo, in defence of a man's person or property, upon some sudden affray, considered by the law as in some measure blameable, and barely excusable. (f)

Defence of persons.
Chance med-

When a man is assaulted in the course of a sudden brawl or quarrel, he may, in some cases, protect himself by killing the person who assaults him, and excuse himself on the ground of self-defence. But, in order to entitle himself to this plea, he must make it appear, first, that before a mortal stroke given he had declined any further combat; secondly, that he then killed his adversary through mere necessity, in order to avoid immediate death. (g) Under such circumstances, the killing will be excusable self-defence, sometimes expressed in the law by the word chance medley, or (as it has been written by some) chaud medley, the former of which, in its etymology, signifies a casual affray; the latter an affray in the heat of blood, or passion. Both of them are pretty much of the same import: but the former has, in common speech, been often erroneously applied to any manner of homicide by misadventure; whereas it appears by one of the statutes, (h) and the ancient books, (i) that it is properly applied to such killing as happens in self-defence upon a sudden rencounter. (k)

Homicide
upon chance medley borders nearly upon manslaughter.

Homicide upon chance medley borders very nearly upon manslaughter; and, in fact and experience, the boundaries are in some instances scarcely perceivable, though in consideration of law they have been fixed. (l) In both cases it is supposed that passion has kindled on each side, and blows have passed between the parties; but in the case of manslaughter, it is either presumed that the combat on both sides had continued to the time the mortal stroke was given, or that the party giving such stroke was not at that time in imminent danger of death. (m) And the true criterion between them is stated to be this: when both parties are actually combating, at the time the mortal stroke was given, the slayer is guilty of manslaughter; but if the slayer has not begun to fight, or, having begun, endeavours to decline any further struggle, and afterwards, being closely pressed by his antagonist, kills him to avoid his own destruction, this is homicide excusable by self-defence. (n)

In all cases of homicide excusable by self-defence, it must be taken that the attack was made upon a sudden occasion, and not premeditated, or with malice; and, from the doctrine which has been above laid down, it appears that the law requires that the person who kills another in his own defence should have retreated as far as he conveniently or safely could, to avoid the violence of the assault, before he turned upon his assailant; and that not fictitiously, or in order to watch his opportunity, but from a real tenderness of shedding his brother's blood. For in no case will a retreat avail, if it be feigned, in order to get an opportunity or interval to enable the party to renew the fight with advantage. (o) The party assaulted must therefore flee, as far as he conveniently can, either by reason of some wall, ditch, or other impediment, or as far as the fierceness of the assault will permit him; for it may be so fierce as not to allow him to yield a step without manifest danger of his life, or great bodily harm, and then, in his defence, he may kill his assailant instantly. (p) Before a person can avail himself of the defence, that he used a weapon in defence of his life, he must satisfy the jury that that defence was necessary; that he did all he could to avoid it; and that it was necessary, to protect his own life, or to protect himself from such serious bodily harm, as would give him a reasonable apprehension that his life was in immediate danger. If he used the weapon, having no other means of resistance, and no means of escape, in such case, if he retreated as far as he could, he would be justified. (q)

The party killing must not act with premeditation, and must forbear as much as he can with safety to himself.

If A. challenges B. to fight, and B. declines the challenge, but lets A. know that he will not be beaten, but will defend himself; and then B., going about his business and wearing his sword, is assaulted by A., and killed; this is murder in A. But if B. had killed A. upon that assault, it had been se defendendo, if he could not otherwise have escaped; or bare manslaughter, if he could have escaped and did not. (r)

As in the case of manslaughter upon sudden provocation, where the parties fight upon equal terms, all malice apart, it matters not who gave the first blow: so in the case of excusable self-defence, it seems that the first assault in a sudden affray, all malice apart, will make no difference, if either party quit the combat and retreat, before a mortal wound be given. (s) According to this doctrine, if A., upon a sudden quarrel, assaults B. first, and upon B.'s returning the assault, A. really and bonâ fide flies, and being driven to the wall, turns again upon B. and kills him, this will be se defendendo: (t) but some writers have thought this opinion too favourable, inasmuch as the necessity to which A. is at last reduced, originally arose from his own fault. (u) With regard to the nature of the necessity, it may be observed, that the party killing cannot, in any case, substantiate his excuse, if he kill his adversary even after a retreat, unless there were reasonable ground to apprehend that he would otherwise have been killed himself. (v)

Under the excuse of self-defence, the principal civil and natural relations are comprehended: therefore, master and servant, parent and child, husband and wife, killing an assailant in the necessary defence of each other, respectively, are excused; the act of the relation assisting being construed the same as the act of the party himself. (w)

property against tres-

If A., in defence of his house, kill B., a trespasser, who endeavours to make an entry upon it, it is at least common manslaughter; unless, indeed, there were danger of his life. But if B. enter into the house, and A., having first requested him to depart, gently lay his hands upon him to turn him out, and then B. turn upon him and assault him, and A. then kill him, it will be se defendendo, supposing that he was not able by any other means to avoid the assault, or retain his lawful possession. And so it will be, if B. enter upon A., and assault him first, though not intending to kill him, but only as a trespasser to gain the possession: for, in such case, if A. thereupon kill B., it will only be se defendendo; and not manslaughter. (x) And it seems, that in such a case A., being in his own house, need not fly as far as he can, as in other cases of se defendendo: for he has the protection of his house to excuse him from flying, as that would be to give up the protection of his house to his adversary by his flight. (y) But where the trespass is barely against the property of another, the law does not admit the force of the provocation as sufficient to warrant the owner in making use of any deadly or dangerous weapon: more particularly if such violence is used after the party has desisted from the trespass. But if the beating be with an instrument, or in a manner not likely to kill, it will only amount to manslaughter: and it is even lawful to exert such force against a trespasser, who comes without any colour, to take the goods of another, as is necessary to make him desist. But it is submitted that the protection of the house extends to each and every individual dwelling in it. In Rex v. Cooper, Cro. C. 544, it was held that a lodger might justly kill a person endeavouring to break into the house where he lodged with intent to commit a felony in it; and see 1 East, P. C. c. 5, s. 57, p. 289. night; he ought, if he has a reasonable opportunity, to endeavour to remove the trespasser, without having recourse to the last extremity. M., who was indicted for murder, had made himself obnoxious to some boatmen, by giving information of certain smuggling transactions, in which some of them had been engaged; and they, in revenge, ducked him, and were in the act of throwing him into the sea, when he was rescued by the police; the boatmen, however, as he was going away, called to him that they would come at night, and pull his house down: in the middle of the night a great number of persons came about his house, singing songs of menace, and using violent language, indicating that they had come with no friendly or peaceable intention. M., under an apprehension, as he alleged, that his life and property were in danger, fired a pistol, by which one of the party was killed. Holroyd, J., 'A civil trespass will not excuse the firing a pistol at a trespasser, in sudden resentment or anger. If a person takes forcible possession of another man's close, so as to be guilty of a breach of the peace, it is more than a trespass; so if a man with force invades and enters into the dwelling of another; but a man is not authorized to fire a pistol on every intrusion or invasion of his house: he ought, if he has a reasonable opportunity, to endeavour to remove him without having recourse to the last extremity: but the making an attack upon a dwelling, and especially at night, the law regards as equivalent to an assault upon a man's person, for a man's house is his castle: and, therefore, in the eye of the law, it is equivalent to an assault; but no words or singing are equivalent to an assault, nor will they authorize an assault in return. If you are satisfied that there was nothing but the song, and no appearance of further violence: if you believe that there was no reasonable ground for apprehending further danger, but that the pistol was fired for the purpose of killing, then it is murder. There are cases where a person, in the heat of blood, kills another, that the law does not deem it murder, but lowers the offence to manslaughter: as, where a party coming up, by way of making an attack, and, without there being any previous apprehension of danger, the party attacked, instead of having recourse to a more reasonable and less violent mode of averting it, having an opportunity so to do, fires on the impulse of the moment. If you are of opinion that the prisoner was really attacked, and that the deceased and his party were on the point of breaking in, or likely to do so, and execute the threats of the day before, he was, perhaps, justified in firing as he did.' (a)

A person must only use so much force as is reasonably necessary, in order to turn a trespasser out of his house. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the prisoner, upon returning home, found the deceased in his house, and desired him to withdraw, but he refused to go: upon this, words arose between them, and the prisoner becoming excited, proceeded to use force, and, by a kick which he gave to the deceased, caused his death. Alderson, B.: 'A kick is not a justifiable mode of turning a man out of your house, though he be a trespasser. If a person becomes excited, and gives another kick, it is an unjustifiable act. If the deceased would not have died but for the injury he received, the prisoner, having unlawfully caused that injury, is guilty of manslaughter.' (b)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that a man and his servant had insisted upon placing corn in the prisoner's barn, which she refused to allow; they exerted force: a scuffle took place, in which the prisoner received a blow on the breast, whereon she threw a stone at the deceased, the master, which killed him. Holroyd, J: 'The case fails, as it appears the deceased received the blow in an attempt to invade the prisoner's barn, against her will. She had a right to defend her barn, and to employ such force as was reasonably necessary for that purpose; and she is not answerable for any unforeseen accident that may have happened in so doing.' (c)

Homicide
nate necessity.

There is one species of homicide se defendendo where the party slain is equally innocent as the person who occasions his death: and yet this homicide is also excusable, from the great universal principle of self-preservation, which prompts every man to save his own life, in preference to that of another, where one of them must inevitably perish. Of this kind is the case mentioned by Lord Bacon, where upon two persons being shipwrecked, and getting on the same plank, one of them, finding it not able to save them both, thrust the other from it, whereby he was drowned. (d) But, according to Lord Hale, a man cannot even excuse the killing of another who is innocent, under a threat, however urgent, of losing his own life, if he do not comply; so that if one man should assault another so fiercely as to endanger his life, in order to compel him to kill a third person, this would give no legal excuse for his compliance. (e) But upon this it has been observed, that if the commission of treason may be extenuated by the fear of present death, and while the party is under actual compulsion (f), there seems to be no reason why homicide may not also be mitigated upon the like consideration, of human infirmity: though, in case the party might have recourse to the law for his protection from the threats used against him, his fears will certainly furnish no excuse for committing the murder. (g)

It should further be observed that, as the excuse of self-defence is founded on necessity, it can in no case extend beyond the actual continuance of that necessity, by which alone it is warranted: (h) for if a person assaulted does not fall upon the aggressor, till the affray is over, or when he is running away, this is revenge, and not defence. SEC. III.

Of Justifiable Homicide.

It has been already stated that justifiable homicide is of several kinds, as it may be occasioned by the performance of acts of unavoidable necessity, or by acts done by the permission of the law. (k)

Acts of unavoidable necessity, or permitted by law.

Amongst the acts of unavoidable necessity may be classed the execution of malefactors, by the person whose office obliges him, in the performance of public justice, to put those to death who have forfeited their lives by the laws and verdict of their country. These are acts of necessity, and even of civil duty: and, therefore, not only justifiable, but commendable, where the law requires them. (l) But the law must require them, otherwise they are not justifiable; and, therefore, wantonly to kill the greatest of malefactors, would be murder; and we have seen that all acts of official duty should, in the nature of their execution, be conformable to the judgment by which they are directed. (m)

Amongst the acts done by the permission of the law, for the advancement of public justice, may be reckoned those of the officer, who, in the execution of his office, either in a civil or criminal case, kills a person who assaults and resists him. The resistance will justify the officer in proceeding to the last extremity. So that in all cases, whether civil or criminal, where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, and using the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, they may repel force with force, and need not give back; and if the party making resistance is unavoidably killed in the struggle, this homicide is justifiable. (n) A rule founded in reason and public utility; for few men would quietly submit to an arrest, if, in every case of resistance, the party empowered to arrest were obliged to desist, and leave the business undone; and a case in which the officer was holden guilty of manslaughter, because he had not first given back, as far as he could, before he killed the party who had escaped out of custody, in execution for a debt, and resisted being retaken, (o) seems to stand alone, and has been mentioned with disapprobation. (p) With respect to offenders against the revenue laws, it is enacted, that if any person, liable to be detained, under that or any other act relating to the customs, shall not be detained at the time of committing the offence for which he is so liable, or after detention, shall make his escape, such person shall and may, at any time afterwards, be detained and taken before any justice, to be dealt with as if detained at the time of committing such offence. Officers killing those who fly from arrest.

But where the party does not resist, but merely flies to avoid the arrest, the conduct of the officer should be cautiously regulated by the nature of the proceeding. For in civil cases, and also in the case of a breach of the peace, or any other misdemeanor, short of felony, if the officer should pursue a defendant flying in order to avoid an arrest, and should kill him in the pursuit, it will be murder or manslaughter, according to the peculiar circumstances by which such homicide may have been attended. (x) But if a felony be committed, and the felon fly from justice, or a dangerous wound be given, it is the duty of every man to use his best endeavours for preventing an escape; and if in the pursuit the party flying be killed, where he cannot be otherwise overtaken, this will be deemed justifiable homicide. (s) This rule is not confined to those who are present, so as to have ocular proof of the fact, or to those who first come to the knowledge of it: for if in these cases fresh suit be made, and a fortiori if hue and cry be levied, all who join in aid of those who began the pursuit are under the same protection of the law. And the same rule holds, if a felon, after an arrest, break away as he is carrying to gaol, and his pursuers cannot retake without killing him. (t)

It must be known that the party has committed a felony.

On an indictment for shooting at the prosecutor with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner was a constable and employed to guard a copse, from which wood had been stolen, and for this purpose carried a loaded gun. From this copse he saw the prosecutor come out, carrying wood which he was stealing, and called to him to stop. The prosecutor ran away, and the prisoner having no other means of bringing him to justice fired, and wounded him in the leg. It was further alleged that the prosecutor was actually committing a felony, he having been before convicted repeatedly of stealing wood; but these convictions were unknown to the prisoner, nor was there any reason for supposing that he knew the difference between the rules of law relating to felony and those relating to less offences. Erle, J., told the jury that shooting with intent to wound amounted to the felony charged, unless from other facts there was a justification; and that neither the belief of the prisoner, that it was his duty to fire, if he could not otherwise apprehend the prosecutor, nor the alleged felony, it being unknown to him, constituted such justification; and upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right: for the prisoner was not justified in firing, because the fact that the prosecutor was committing a felony was unknown to him at the time. (u)

Where a person is indicted for a felony, and will not suffer himself to be arrested by an officer, having a warrant for that purpose, the officer may lawfully kill him if he cannot otherwise be taken; though such person be innocent, and though in truth no felony have been committed. (v) But it seems that this must be understood only of arrests by officers, and does not extend to arrests by private persons of their own authority. (w)

In the case of a riot or rebellious assembly, the peace officers and their assistants, endeavouring to disperse the mob, are justified, both at common law and by the riot act, in proceeding to the last extremity, in case the riot cannot otherwise be suppressed. (x) And it has been said, that perhaps the killing of dangerous rioters may be justified by any private persons who cannot otherwise suppress them, or defend themselves from them, inasmuch as every private person seems to be authorized by the law to arm himself for the preservation of the peace. (y)

Gaolers and their officers are under the same special protection as other ministers of justice; and, therefore, if in the necessary discharge of their duty, they meet with resistance, whether from prisoners in civil or criminal suits, or from others, in behalf of such prisoners, they are not obliged to retreat as far as they can with safety, but may freely, and without retreating, repel force by force; and if the party so resisting happen to be killed, this, on the part of the gaoler, or his officer, or any person coming in aid of him, will be justifiable homicide. (z)

Sir William Hawkesworth being weary of life, and willing to be rid of it by the hand of another, having first blamed his keeper for suffering his deer to be destroyed, and commanded him to execute the law, came himself into his park at night as if with intent to steal the deer; and being questioned by the keeper, who knew him not, and refusing to stand or answer, he was shot by the keeper. This was decided to be excusable homicide by the statute De malefactoribus in parcis. (a)

A man may repel force by force in defence of his person, habitation, or property, against one who manifestly intends and endeavours, by violence or surprise, to commit a known felony upon either. In these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary till he finds himself out of danger; and if, in a conflict between them, he happens to kill, such killing is

By the 21 Edw. 1, st. 2, if a forester, parker, or warrener, found any trespassers wandering within his liberty, intending to do damage therein, who would not yield, after hue and cry made to stand unto the peace, but continued their malice, and disobeying the King's peace, did flee or defend themselves with force and arms, if such forester, parker, or warrener, or their assistants, killed such offenders, either in arresting or taking them, they should not be troubled for the same, nor suffer any punishment. The 21 Edw. 1, st. 2, was repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 27, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 53. justifiable. (b) But it has been holden, that this rule does not apply to any crime unaccompanied with force, as picking of pockets. (c) It seems, therefore, that the intent to murder, ravish, or commit other felonies attended with force or surprise, should be apparent, and not be left in doubt; so that if A. make an attack upon B., it must plainly appear by the circumstances of the case (as the manner of the assault, the weapon, &c.) that the life of B. is in imminent danger; otherwise his killing the assailant will not be justifiable self-defence. (d) There must be an intention on the part of the person killed to rob, or murder, or to do some dreadful bodily injury to the person killing; or the conduct of the party must be such as to render it necessary on the part of the party killing to do the act in self-defence. (e) And the rule clearly extends only to cases of felony; for if one come to beat another, or to take his goods merely as a trespasser, though the owner may justify the beating of him, so far as to make him desist, yet if he kill him, it is manslaughter. (f) But if a house be broken open, though in the day-time, with a felonious intent, it will be within the rule. (g) A person who is set to watch a yard or garden by his master, is not justified in shooting anyone who comes into it in the night, even if he see him go into his master's hen-roost, and some dead fowls and a crow-bar be found near him; but if from his conduct he has fair ground to believe his own life in actual danger, he is justified in shooting him. (h)

Grounds of suspicion of a felonious design.
Levet's case.

Important considerations will arise in cases of this kind, as to the grounds which the party killing had for supposing that the person slain had a felonious design against him; more especially where it afterwards appears that no such design existed. One Levet was indicted for killing F. F., under the following circumstances:—Levet being in bed and asleep, his servant, who had procured F. F. to help her about the work of the house, and went to the door about twelve o'clock at night to let her out, conceived that she heard thieves about to break into the house: upon which she ran to him, and told him of what she apprehended. Levet arose immediately, took a drawn sword, and, with his wife, went down stairs; when the servant, fearing that her master and mistress should see F. F., hid her in the buttery. Levet with his sword searched the entry for thieves, when his wife, spying F. F. in the buttery, and not knowing her, conceived her to be a thief, and cried out to her husband in great fear, 'Here they be that would undo us;' when Levet, not knowing that it was F. F. in the buttry, hastily entered with his drawn sword, and being in the dark, and thrusting before him with his sword, thrust F. F. under the left breast and gave her a mortal wound, of which she instantly died. (i) This was ruled to be misadventure; but a great Judge appears to have thought the decision too lenient, and that it would have been better ruled manslaughter; due circumspection not having been used. (k) Upon this opinion, however, some observations have been made; and it has been ably argued, upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of the transaction, that the case seems more properly to be one of those mentioned by Lord Hale, (l) where the ignorance of the fact excuses the party from all sort of blame. (m) And in another book of great authority, the case is mentioned as one in which the defendant might have justified the fact under the circumstances, on the ground that it had not the appearance even of a fault. (n)

Questions will also sometimes arise as to the apparency of the intent in one of the parties to commit such felony as will justify the other in killing him. Mawgridge, on words of anger, threw a bottle with great force at the head of Mr. Cope, and immediately drew his sword, upon which Mr. Cope returned a bottle with equal violence: (o) and it was held that this was lawful and justifiable on the part of Mr. Cope, on the ground that he that has manifested malice against another, is not fit to be trusted with a dangerous weapon in his hand. (p) There seems to have been good reason for Mr. Cope to have supposed that his life was in danger: and it was probably on the same ground that the judgment on Ford's case proceeded. Mr. Ford being in possession of a room at a tavern, several persons insisted upon having it, and turning him out, which he refused to submit to; thereupon they drew their swords upon Mr. Ford and his company, and Mr. Ford drew his sword, and killed one of them; and this was adjudged justifiable homicide. (q) For if several attack a person at once with deadly weapons, as may be supposed to have happened in this case, though they wait till he be upon his guard, yet it seems (there being no compact to fight) that he would be justified in killing any of the assailants in his own defence; because so unequal an attack resembles more a desire of assassination than of combat. (r) But no assault, however violent, will justify killing the assailant under the plea of necessity, unless there be a plain manifestation of a felonious intent. (s) And it may be further observed, that a man cannot, in any case, justify killing another by a pretence of necessity, unless he were wholly without fault in it is said that the memorandum in the margin of Kelyng to inquire of this case, and the quere used by Mr. J. Foster in citing it, were probably made on the ground of the reason suggested in the margin of Kelyng for the judgment, namely, that the killing by Mr. Ford in defence of his own possession of the room was justifiable, which, under those circumstances, might be fairly questioned: as, on that ground, it might have been better ruled to be manslaughter.

bringing that necessity upon himself; for, if he kill any person in defence of an injury done by himself, he is guilty of manslaughter at least; as in the case where a body of people wrongfully detained a house by force, and killed one of those who attacked it, and endeavoured to set in on fire. (t)

Mr. J. Foster was of opinion, that, upon the same principle upon which Mawgridge's case was decided, and possibly upon the rule touching the arrest of a person who has given a dangerous wound, the Legislature, in the case of the Marquis de Guiscard, who stabbed Mr. Harley sitting in Council, discharged the parties who were supposed to have given the Marquis the mortal wound from all manner of prosecution on that account, and declared the killing to be a lawful and necessary action. (u)

Where a known felony is attempted upon anyone, not only the party assaulted may repel force by force, but his servant attending him, or any other person present, may interpose to prevent the mischief; and if death ensue, the party so interposing will be justified. (v) So, where an attempt is made to commit arson, or burglary, in the habitation, any part of the owner's family, or even a lodger, may lawfully kill the assailants, in order to prevent the mischief intended. (w)

But, in cases of mutual combats or sudden affrays, a person interfering should act with much caution. Where, indeed, a person interferes between two combatants with a view to preserve the peace, and not to take part with either, giving due notice of his intention, and is under the necessity of killing one of them in order to preserve his own life or that of the other combatant, it being impossible to preserve them by other means, such killing will be justifiable; (x) but, in general, if there be an affray and an actual fighting and striving between persons, and another run in, and take part with one party, and kill the other, it will not be justifiable homicide, but manslaughter. (y)

It should be observed, that as homicide committed in the prevention of forcible and atrocious crimes is justifiable only upon the plea of necessity, it cannot be justified, unless the necessity continue to the time when the party is killed. Thus, though the person upon whom a felonious attack is first made be not obliged to retreat, but may pursue the felon till he finds himself out of danger; yet if the felon be killed after he has been properly secured, and when the apprehension of danger has ceased, such killing will be murder; though perhaps, if the blood were still hot from the contest or pursuit, it might be held to be only manslaughter, on account of the high provocation. CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF DESTROYING INFANTS IN THE MOTHER'S WOMB.

WE have already seen, that an infant in its mother's womb, not being in rerum naturâ, is not considered as a person who can be killed within the description of murder. (a) An attempt, however, to effect the destruction of such an infant, though unsuccessful, appears to have been treated as a misdemeanor at common law. (b)

The 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, and 7 Will. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 85, formerly made certain attempts to procure the miscarriage of any woman highly penal: but these Acts are repealed, and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58, 'Every woman, being with child, who, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, shall unlawfully administer to herself any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, and whosoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully (c) administer to her or cause to be taken by her any poison or other noxious thing, (d) or shall unlawfully (e) use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (f)

Sec. 59. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully supply or procure any poison or other noxious thing, or any instrument or thing whatsoever, knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be

(d) The words of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, in s. 1, were 'any deadly poison or other noxious and destructive substance or thing;' in sec. 2, 'any medicines, drug, or other substance or thing whatsoever.' The words in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, where the woman was quick with child, were, 'any poison or other noxious thing.' Where the woman was not quick with child, 'any medicine or other thing.' See note (k), post, p. 901.

(e) 'Unlawfully' was not in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 13.

(f) This clause is framed on the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 6. The first part of it is new, and extends the former enactment to any woman, who, being with child, attempts to procure her own miscarriage. The second part in terms makes it immaterial whether the woman were or were not with child, in accordance with the decision in Reg. v. Goodhall, 1 Den. C. C. 187; S. C. as *Reg. v. Sec. 71. 'Whenever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any punishment by this Act authorized, fine the offender, and require him to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace, and being of good behaviour; and in case of any felony punishable under this Act otherwise than with death the Court may, if it shall think fit, require the offender to enter into his own recognizances and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace, in addition to any punishment by this Act authorized: provided that no person shall be imprisoned, for not finding sureties under this clause, for any period exceeding one year.' (i)

The 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, and the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, made an important distinction between the case where the woman was quick with child, and where she was not, or was not proved to be, quick with child. (j) Under the present Act, however, in the case of the mother, all that it is necessary to prove is that she was with child, and in the case of any other person, it is immaterial whether the woman were or were not with child.

An infusion or decoction of a shrub are ejusdem generis. The question upon sec. 2

An indictment upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, s. 2, charged the prisoner with having administered to a woman a decoction of a certain shrub called savin: and it appeared upon the evidence that the prisoner prepared the medicine which he administered, by pouring boiling water on the leaves of a shrub. The medical men who were examined stated, that such a preparation is called an infusion, and not a decoction (which is made by boiling the substance in the water), upon which the prisoner's counsel insisted that he was entitled to an acquittal, on the ground that the medicine was misdescribed. But Lawrence, J., overruled the objection, and said, that infusion and decoction are ejusdem generis, and that the variance was immaterial: that the question was, whether the prisoner administered any matter or thing to the woman to procure abortion? (h)

(g) This clause is new. It is intended to check the obtaining of poison, &c., for the purpose of causing abortion, by making both the person who supplies and the person who procures it guilty of a misdemeanor.

On an indictment for administering featherfew and other drugs to procure abortion, it appeared that the prisoner gave the woman, who was alleged to be with child by him, two powders, with directions to take one on each of two successive nights, and said that the effect would be to cause miscarriage. She took one of the powders, with the featherfew, which brought on violent sickness. The other powder was examined by a physician, and he could not discover any mineral substance in it: as far as he could judge from the taste, smell, and appearance, it was a mixture of savin and fennigreek, the latter being the larger ingredient. The fennigreek would scarcely produce any effect at all; savin, in that quantity, might produce a little disturbance in the stomach for the time, but would do no further injury. Featherfew (l) is a herb very similar to camomile: it is a tonic in common use among the peasantry, and has nothing noxious in it. A mixture of the powder and decoction of this herb would not alter the properties of either. The prisoner upon two or three subsequent occasions had brought the woman other medicines to take for the same purpose, some of which she had taken, but not the rest. Wilde, C. J., held that the evidence was not sufficient to prove that the drugs administered came within the meaning of the words 'poison or other noxious thing.' (m) of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, was whether any matter or thing was administered to procure abortion.

Noxious thing.

(h) Rex v. Phillips, 3 Campb. 74. And in Rex v. Coe, 6 C. & P. 403, where the prisoner was indicted on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 13, for administering saffron to a female, and his counsel was cross-examining as to her having taken something else before the saffron, and also as to the innoxious nature of the article; Vaughan, B., said, 'Does that signify? It is with the intention that the jury have to do; and if the prisoner administered a bit of bread merely with intent to procure abortion, it is sufficient.' It is not stated upon which branch of the section this indictment was framed; if upon the latter, which used the words 'any medicine or other thing,' perhaps the dictum was right. But it should seem that neither this dictum, nor that of Lawrence, J., in Rex v. Phillips, apply to the new Act, which uses the words 'any poison or other noxious thing' only, in the case of administering or causing to be taken; and although a doubt has been suggested in a note to Rex v. Coe as to whether the words 'other means' might not be applied to other substances than such as are poisonous or noxious; it should seem that the words 'other means' cannot be so applied in the new Act: first, because they are in an entirely distinct sentence; secondly, because they are governed by the word use, and not by administer. See Rosc. Cr. Evid. 243. C. S. G.

(l) The proper name of this is feverfew, matricaria, so called from its supposed use in disorders of the womb.—Edinb. Med. & Phys. Diet.

(m) Reg. v. Perry, 2 Cox C. C. 223. Wilde, C. J., also held that the other transactions were admissible as showing the intent with which the particular drugs referred to in the indictment were administered. See Reg. v. Calder, post. As the prisoner administered the drugs with intent to procure a miscarriage, and as savin is unquestionably in its nature a noxious drug, the decision in this case seems open to great doubt. It is submitted that the true meaning of the words 'poison or other noxious thing' is such things as in their nature are poisonous or noxious; and that it is a misapprehension to suppose that the statute requires such a quantity of a poison or other noxious thing to be administered as shall be noxious. If a person administers any quantity of a poison, however small,

It was necessary that the woman should be with child, but is not so now in general.

[674]

What is an administering.

What is a causing to be taken.

But it was held, on the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, s. 2, that unless the woman were with child, the offence was not committed, although the prisoner thought she was with child, and administered the drug with intent to destroy the child. (n) But the new Act makes this immaterial, except in cases where the mother is the offender.

To constitute an administering, or causing to be taken, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by the hand. Where, therefore, on an indictment for administering poison and causing poison to be taken, it appeared that the prisoner had mixed poison with coffee, and had told her mistress that the coffee was for her, and the mistress took it, and drank some of it; it was held that this was sufficient. (o) A mere delivery to the woman, however, is not sufficient: the poison must be taken into the mouth, and, it seems, some of it swallowed, to constitute an administering. (p)

Upon an indictment for unlawfully administering to, and causing to be taken by, Emma Cheney poison, with intent to procure her miscarriage, it appeared that she, being and believing herself to be pregnant, applied to the prisoner to get her something to procure her miscarriage, and that the prisoner accordingly purchased some preparation of mercury, which he gave to her, directing her to take one-half of the quantity in gin: Cheney accordingly procured the gin, and, in the absence of the prisoner, took the dose, which produced a miscarriage. The jury found these facts, and that the mercury was both given by the prisoner to Cheney, and taken by her, with intent to procure the miscarriage; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was properly convicted; as there was a 'causing to be taken' within the meaning of the statute. (q) So where on a similar indictment it appeared that the prisoner had talked with L. Chuter about her being with child, and brought her a bunch of savin, and told her, if she put it in some gin, and took from half a glass to a glass two or three times a week, it would destroy her child, and she took the savin and gin three or four times accordingly; and the prisoner afterwards induced Chuter to get some blue pills from a chemist, which the prisoner made up with some flour and tea into pills, of which Chuter took twenty or thirty, and was very ill from the time of taking the pills till she was confined; it was held, upon a case reserved, that there was no distinction between this and the preceding case. (r) it has never yet been doubted, that, if it were done with intent to murder, the offence of administering poison with intent to murder was complete; and Reg. v. Cluderoy, 1 Den. C. C. 514, post, which was decided after this case, shows that if poison be administered in such a way that it cannot injure, the offence is nevertheless complete; and Wilde, C. J., there said, 'the act of administering poison with intent to kill is proved. The effect of that act is beside the question.' It is submitted, therefore, that if there be an intent to procure abortion, it is quite immaterial how small the quantity be of the poison or other noxious thing that is administered.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

OF RAPE, THE UNLAWFUL CARNAL KNOWLEDGE OF FEMALE CHILDREN, AND PROCURING THE DEFILEMENT OF GIRLS UNDER AGE.

SEC. I.

Of Rape.

Definition of rape.
Formerly a capital offence.

RAPE has been defined to be the having unlawful and carnal knowledge of a woman, by force, and against her will. (a)

This offence formerly was, for many years, justly visited with capital punishment; but it does not appear to have been regarded as equally heinous at all periods of our Constitution. Anciently, indeed, it appears to have been treated as a felony, and, consequently, punishable with death; but this was afterwards thought too hard; and, in its stead, another severe but not capital punishment was inflicted by William the Conqueror, namely, castration and loss of eyes, which continued till after Bracton wrote, in the reign of Henry III. (b) The punishment for rape was still further mitigated, in the reign of Edward I., by the statute of Westm. 1, c. 13, which reduced the offence to a trespass, and subjected the party to two years' imprisonment, and a fine at the King's will. This lenity, however, is said to have been productive of terrible consequences; and it was, therefore, found necessary, in about ten years afterwards, and in the same reign, again to make the offence of forcible rape a felony, by the statute Westm. 2, c. 34. The punishment was still further enhanced by the 18 Eliz., c. 7, s. 1. But the former statutes are repealed.

Rape. And now by the 24 & 25 Viet., c. 100, s. 48, 'Whosoever shall be convicted of the crime of rape shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (c) rape, are principal offenders in the second degree, whether they be men or women. (e) And there may be accessories before and after in this offence; and such accessories are punishable under the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 67. (f)

The law presumes that an infant, under the age of fourteen years, is unable to commit the crime of rape; and, therefore, he cannot be guilty of it; (g) or of an assault with intent to commit a rape; (h) and if he be under that age, no evidence is admissible to show that, in point of fact, he could commit the offence of rape. (i) This doctrine, however, proceeds upon the ground of impotency, rather than the want of discretion; and such infant may, therefore, be a principal in the second degree, as aiding and assisting in this offence, as well as in other felonies, if it appear, by sufficient circumstances, that he had a mischievous discretion. (k) A husband cannot be guilty of a rape upon his wife, on account of the matrimonial consent which she has given, and which she cannot retract; but he may be guilty as a principal, by assisting another person to commit a rape upon his wife; for though in marriage the wife has given up her body to her husband, she is not by him to be prostituted to another. (l) Where a party took a woman by force, compelled her to marry him, and then had carnal knowledge of her by force, it appears to have been holden, that she could not maintain an appeal of rape against her husband, unless the marriage were first legally dissolved: but that when the marriage was made void, ab initio, by a declaratory sentence in the ecclesiastical court, the offence became punishable, as if there had been no marriage. (m) The forcible taking away, and marrying a woman against her will, was, however, made felony by the 3 Hen. 7, c. 2. And though that statute is repealed, the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, ss. 53, 54, 55, (n) makes certain provisions against the forcible or unlawful abduction of females, which will be mentioned in a subsequent chapter.

The offence of rape may be committed, though the woman at last yielded to the violence, if such her consent was forced by fear of death or by duress. (o) If non-resistance on the part of a prosecutrix proceeds merely from her being overpowered by actual force, or from her not being able, from want of strength, to resist any longer, or from the number of persons attacking her, she considered resistance dangerous, and absolutely useless, the crime is complete. (p) And it will not be any excuse that she was first taken with her own consent, if she were afterwards forced against her will; nor will it be an excuse that she consented after the fact, or that she was a common strumpet, or the concubine of the ravisher: for she is still under the protection of the law, and may not be forced. (q) Circumstances of this kind, however, though they do not necessarily prevent the offence from amounting to a rape, yet are material to be left to the jury, in favour of the party accused, especially in doubtful cases. (r) The notion that if the woman conceived it could not be a rape, because she must, in such case, have consented, appears to be quite exploded. (s)

Having connection with a girl in a state of insensibility produced by liquor given to her by the prisoner for the purpose of exciting her, is rape.

Upon an indictment for rape, it appeared that the prisoner had made the prosecutrix, a girl of thirteen years of age, quite drunk, and when she was in a state of insensibility took advantage of it, and violated her. The jury found that he gave her the liquor for the purpose of exciting her, not with the intention of rendering her insensible, and then having sexual intercourse with her. It was contended that to constitute rape there must be actual resistance to that force: there must be an opposing will on the part of the woman: but, upon a case reserved, ten Judges held that the conviction was right. Several of these Judges thought that the crime of rape is committed by violating a woman when she is in a state of insensibility, and has no power over her will, whether such state is caused by the man or not, the man knowing at that time that she is in such state: and Tindal, C. J., and Parke, B., remarked that in the statute of Westminster 2, c. 34, (t) the offence of rape is described to be ravishing a woman 'where she did not consent,' and not ravishing against her will. But all the ten Judges agreed that in this case, where the prosecutrix was made insensible by the act of the prisoner, and that an unlawful act, and when also the prisoner must have known that the act was against her consent at the last moment that she was capable of exercising her will, because he had attempted to procure her assent, and failed, the offence of rape was committed. Three other Judges did not think that this was sufficiently proved. (u)

(u) Reg. v. Camplin, 1 Den. C. C. R. 90. The grounds of the decision are taken from the addenda as furnished by Parke, B. In the course of the argument Patteson, J., said, 'If a man knocks a woman down and makes her insensible, and then has connection with her whilst she is insensible, according to the argument for the prisoner, that would be no rape, because she did not resist and evinced no opposing will;' and Alderson, B., added: 'In cases of fraud the woman's will is exercised, though it is exercised under the influence of fraud; but in the case put by my brother Patteson there is force. There resistance was impossible, owing to the blow given by the prisoner; here it was rendered impossible by the liquor which he had administered.' There is no statement in Den. C. C. to warrant the allegation that the prisoner had attempted to obtain the prosecutrix's consent, and failed. Where, on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix stated that she usually slept with her father, and having gone to sleep by his side, on waking she found he was having connection with her; and Camplin's case, supra, was relied on for the position that, if the prisoner had connection with the girl while she was in such a state as to be incapable of giving consent, it was rape. Alderson, B., said, 'I do not understand that case to have gone so far as you affirm. It only decided that where the state of unconsciousness was caused by any act of the prisoner, connection with the woman in such a state would constitute the offence. The wine was offered to her by the man in that case, and there was at any rate evidence to show that he had induced her to take it.

On an indictment for rape, it appeared that the prosecutrix was an idiot, and when asked questions in the witness-box, was evidently unconscious of their purport, and not in a condition to understand right from wrong; and Platt, B. interrogated her father as to her general habits, whether they were those of decency and propriety, and he replied that they were. Platt, B., told the jury that the question was, did the connection take place with her consent? It seems that she was in a state incapable of judging, and it is important to consider whether a young person, in such a state of incapacity, was likely to consent to the embraces of this man: because if her habits, however irresponsible she might be, were loose and indecent, there might be a probability of such consent being given, and a jury might not think it safe to conclude that she was not a willing party. But here the presumption is that the young woman would not have consented; and if she was in a state of unconsciousness at the time the connection took place, whether it was produced by any act of the prisoner, or by any act of her own, anyone having connection with her would be guilty of rape. If you believe that she was in a state of unconsciousness, the law assumes that the connection took place without her consent, and the prisoner is guilty of the crime charged.’(v) So on a trial for a rape upon an idiot girl, Willes, J. directed the jury, that if they were satisfied that the girl was in such a state of idiocy as to be incapable of expressing either consent or dissent, and that the prisoner had connection with her without her consent, it was their duty to find him guilty; but that a consent produced by mere animal instinct would be sufficient to prevent the act from constituting a rape.(w)

Upon an indictment for rape, it appeared that the prosecutrix was thirteen years old, and of weak intellect, and incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong. It was proved by witnesses who saw them that the prisoner had sexual intercourse with the girl, but she was not shown to have made any resistance, though she did exclaim, whilst the prisoner was in the act, that he hurt her, and on the prisoner rising from her and her getting up, she made a start as if to run away. The girl, when placed in the witness-box, appeared not to possess sufficient intelligence to be sworn. It was objected that it was not proved that the prisoner had carnal knowledge of the girl against her will. The jury were told, that if they thought the girl was incapable of giving consent, or of exercising any judgment upon the matter, and if they were satisfied that the prisoner had carnal knowledge of the girl by force and without her consent, they ought to convict; the jury convicted, and stated that they

Connection with an idiot, without consent, is rape.

I concurred in that judgment only on that ground.’ Reg. v. Page, 2 Cox C. C. 133. Alderson, B., read the following note of the ground of his opinion in Camplin’s case:—‘The rest of the Judges in the affirmative thought that on these facts it must be presumed that this was contra voluntatem, it being clear that the woman had not consented when he began to administer the liquor, and that she never did actually consent at all; that his having connection with her when insensible was therefore clearly contra voluntatem ultimam, which must be, as against him, presumed to continue unchanged. Patteson, J., Denman, C. J., and Parke, B., thought that a connection without the consent of the woman was rape, e. g., in the case of a woman insensibly drunk in the streets, not made so by the prisoner. This, therefore, should be reserved when it occurs.’

(v) Reg. v. Ryan, 2 Cox C. C. 115.

(w) Anonymous stated by Willes, J. Bell, C. C. 70.

considered the girl was incapable of giving consent from defect of understanding; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. Lord Campbell, C. J.: 'The question is what is the real definition of the crime of rape, whether it is the ravishing a woman against her will or without her consent. If the former is the correct definition, the crime is not in this case proved; if the latter, it is proved. Camplin's case (x) seems to me really to settle what the proper definition is; and the decision in that case rests upon the authority of an Act of Parliament. The statute of Westminster 2, c. 34, defines the crime to be where "a man do ravish a woman, married, maid, or other, where she did not consent before nor after." We are bound by that definition. It was adopted in Camplin's case, acted upon in Ryan's case, (y) and subsequently in a case before Willes, J. (z) It would be monstrous to say that if a drunken woman returning from market lay down and fell asleep by the road side, and a man, by force, had connection with her whilst in a state of insensibility and incapable of giving consent, he would not be guilty of rape.' (a)

Submission in consequence of a reign of terror.

Where on the trial of a father for a rape on his daughter, aged fourteen years, it appeared that her father laid hold of her and had connection with her; he had previously told her not to tell anyone what he had done to her; he had said he would throttle her and kill her, if she told anything he had done; he had throttled her, and had had connection with her many times before; and on these occasions he had told her not to tell, and that was the reason she did not tell; she consented to the prisoner's having connection with her because she was afraid of him; she was afraid of his choking her. Channell, B., told the jury, that 'if it is made out to your satisfaction that a kind of reign of terror was set up in this family, and in consequence of that terror and dread the girl allowed the connection to take place without resistance, then I am of opinion you may convict. It is possible she may have been a consenting party, and not influenced by dread: that is a question for you. She says the same thing had been done upon previous occasions, and her father had told her he would throttle her if she told her mother, and that is why she did not tell. She says she begged him not to do it, and to be quiet and leave her alone. This, in ordinary cases, would be quite insufficient; but in this case, if you think she remained passive under the influence of that dread and reign of terror which I have mentioned, and that is clearly made out, you may find the prisoner guilty.' (b)

A person having connection with a married woman, she supposing him to be her husband, is not guilty of a rape.

A question has several times arisen, whether having carnal knowledge of a married woman, under circumstances which induce her to suppose it is her husband, amounts to a rape. The prisoner broke and entered a house by night, in order to have connection with the owner's wife, if he could pass as her husband, but not meaning to force her if she discovered the fraud; he was in the act of copulation when she made the discovery, and immediately, and before completion, he desisted. Upon an indictment for burglary, with intent to commit a rape, the jury found that he entered with the intent to pass for the woman's husband, and to have connection with her if she did not make the discovery, and to desist if she did. Upon a case reserved, four of the Judges thought that the having a carnal knowledge of a woman, while she was under the belief of its being her husband, would be a rape; but the other eight Judges thought that it would not; and Dallas, C. J., pointed out forcibly the difference between compelling a woman against her will, when the abhorrence which would naturally arise in her mind was called into action, and beguiling her into consent and co-operation. But several of the eight Judges intimated, that if the case should occur again, they would advise the jury to find a special verdict. (c)

It has been held in several cases, that if a man gets into bed with a married woman, and, by fraud, has connection with her, she believing him to be her husband, and therefore consenting to the connection, it is not a rape. In the first case, on an indictment for a rape, it appeared that the prosecutrix and her husband had gone to bed, and that she soon fell asleep with her back towards her husband, and that afterwards she was awoke by feeling a hand passed round her, which turned her round; and she, supposing it to be her husband, made no resistance to that, or to the connection which immediately followed; but that while the connection was going on, she perceived by the person's breathing that it was not her husband, and immediately pushed him off her. The husband, having taken physic, had been obliged to go down stairs, where he was a quarter of an hour. Gurney, B., told the jury: 'I am bound to tell you, that the evidence in this case does not establish the charge contained in this indictment, as the crime was not committed against the will of the prosecutrix, as she consented, believing it to be her husband.' (d) In the second case, it was opened that the prisoner had got into bed with the prosecutrix while she was asleep, and had penetrated her person before she was aware that it was not her husband, and that the prisoner persisted and went on to complete his purpose notwithstanding her resistance, after she had discovered that it was not her husband; and it was submitted, on this state of facts, that this case was distinguishable from Rex v. Jackson, (e) as there the prisoner intended to desist if discovered, but that here he was determined, at all events, to effectuate his intention. It appeared, however, from the evidence of the prosecutrix, that the prisoner had got into her bed while she was asleep, and that she had permitted him to have connection with her, believing him to be her husband, and that she did not discover who he was till after the connection was over. Alderson, B.: 'That puts an end to the capital part of the charge. The case of Rex v. Jackson is in point.' (f) So where upon an indictment for rape it appeared that the prosecutrix, a married woman, went to bed, expecting her husband to come to bed to her; she fell asleep, and was awakened by a man in bed with her, whom she believed to be her husband getting into bed; she then fell asleep again, and in about ten minutes was awakened by the man in bed with her drawing her towards him, and having connection with her. She assented to the connection in the belief that the man was her husband. She afterwards fell asleep again, and on awaking first discovered that the man in bed with her was the prisoner, who, finding himself detected, jumped out of bed and went away. The jury convicted, but also found that the prisoner intended to have connection with the prosecutrix fraudulently but not by force, and, if detected, to desist; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the case was governed by Rex v. Jackson, (g) and that the conviction was wrong. (h)

Connection commenced when a girl was asleep.

Where upon an indictment for rape the prosecutrix, a girl of thirteen, stated that she usually slept with her father, and having gone to sleep by his side, on awaking she found him having connection with her; the prisoner had had connection with her before, but she had never complained to anyone, nor would she of her own accord now, and a woman, who saw them together on the bed on the occasion in question, stated that the girl appeared to lie quiet for a moment while the prisoner was upon her, but on seeing the witness she immediately attempted to push him off. Coleridge, J., told the jury: 'The question is, was she a consenting party? and you cannot doubt, after the evidence you have heard, that, although not in a state to give consent when the connection began, she betrayed no disposition to resistance when she might have done so, and that, too, before the connection was at an end. She had been so treated before without complaining, nor would she, from her own statement, have complained now. I think, therefore, there is not such an absence of consent throughout as to justify a conviction of rape.' (i)

Obtaining possession of a girl's person by pretence of medical treatment.

Upon an indictment containing a count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and a count for a common assault, it appeared that the defendant, a surgeon, attended the prosecutrix for bleeding piles, and had been with her to consult another surgeon, and afterwards went with her into her bed-room, and told her he was ordered to give her an injection, and directed her to put her head on the bed and her feet on the floor, which she did, and her clothes were up over her back. He then began to use the injection, and the water ran down her legs. She was going to raise herself up, and he said, 'Put your head on the bed and do not stir for a moment.' She had had injections before, and they keep persons still for a little while after they are applied. As she lay she perceived something very warm against her person; she resisted, and rose up from the bed, and said, 'Doctor, what do you mean?' His small clothes were quite open. She felt the parts of the prisoner enter hers just a little. Coleridge, J.: 'An assault with intent to commit a rape is very different from an assault with intent to have improper connection. The former is with intent to have connection by force; but here, according to the statement of the prosecutrix, the prisoner desists the moment she resists, and at most it could only be an attempt by surprise to get possession of the person of the prosecutrix, and that is not an assault with intent to commit a rape, but is an assault. If in this case the prisoner had intended to have effected his purpose by force, the complete offence of rape would have been proved, as the prosecutrix states that the prisoner penetrated her person, and the smallest penetration is sufficient to complete the offence of rape.' (h)

Upon an indictment for assault it appeared that the prisoner was a medical man, and that the girl alleged to have been assaulted was fourteen years old, and had been placed under his professional care in consequence of illness arising from suppressed menstruation. The defendant gave her medicines, and on her going to his house, and informing him that she was no better, he observed, 'Then I must try further means with you.' He then laid her down in the surgery, lifted up her clothes and had connection with her, she making no resistance, believing, as she stated, that she was submitting to medical treatment for the ailment under which she laboured. The jury were directed that the girl was of an age to consent to a man having connection with her, and that if they thought she consented to such connection with the defendant, he ought to be acquitted; but if they were satisfied she was ignorant of the nature of the defendant's act, and made no resistance solely from a bonâ-fide belief that the defendant was (as he represented) treating her medically with a view to her cure, his conduct amounted in point of law to an assault. The jury convicted, and, upon a case reserved upon the question whether this direction to the jury was correct in point of law, after argument, Wilde, C. J., thus delivered judgment: 'This case is free from doubt. The finding of the jury is clear. They are told that if they think she consented to the connection, they must acquit; that the girl was competent to consent; and that it is a question for them whether she did so or no. This is said to be qualified by what follows, viz., that if they thought she made no resistance, solely from the belief that the prisoner was treating her medically, they should convict of an assault. I do not see that this is any qualification; it is a strictly correct direction. The girl is fourteen years old. She might at that age be ignorant of the nature of the act, morally as well as physically, and of its possible consequences. It is said that, as she made no resistance, she must be viewed as a consenting party. That is a fallacy. Children who go to a dentist make no resistance; but they are not consenting parties. The prisoner disarmed her by fraud. She acquiesced under a misrepresentation that what he was doing was with a view to a cure, and that only; whereas it was done solely to gratify the passion of the prisoner. How does this differ from a case of total deception? She consented to one thing; he did another materially different, on which she had been prevented by his fraud from exercising her judgment and will. The cases (l) which have been referred to show that where consent is caused by fraud, the act is at least an assault, and perhaps amounts to rape. It has been suggested that were the act to be regarded in the light of medical treatment, it would be no offence, and that it was not left to the jury whether the prisoner did not intend it as such. That certainly was not left to them, nor need have been. The notion that a medical man might lawfully adopt such a mode of treatment is not to be tolerated in a court of justice. He would have committed a high ecclesiastical offence, at all events.' (m)

If a medical man has connection with a girl of fourteen years of age under the pretence that he is treating her medically for a complaint, under which she is labouring, and she offers no resistance under the bonâ-fide belief that such is the case, he is at least guilty of an assault — perhaps of rape.

necessary to constitute the

It is agreed that there must be penetration, or res in re, in order to constitute the 'carnal knowledge,' which is a necessary part of this offence. (n) But a very slight penetration is sufficient. Thus, where it was proved on behalf of a prisoner, who was charged with having ravished a young girl, that the passage of her parts was so narrow that a finger could not be introduced; and that the membrane called the hymen, which crosses the vagina, and is an indubitable mark of virginity, was perfectly whole and unbroken; but it was admitted that the hymen is in some cases an inch, and in others an inch and a half, beyond the orifice of the vagina. (o) Ashhurst, J., left it to the jury to say whether any penetration were proved. And the Judges afterwards held, upon a conference (De Grey, C. J., and Eyre, B., being absent), that this direction was perfectly right; and that the least degree of penetration is sufficient, though it may not be attended with the deprivation of the marks of virginity. (p)

It is not necessary that the hymen should be ruptured. Any degree of penetration is sufficient.

Whatever doubts may have been entertained as to the extent of penetration that was necessary since the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it is now settled that any penetration is sufficient, although the hymen be not ruptured. On an indictment for abusing a child, under ten years old, where it was proved that the hymen was ruptured, Mr. B. Gurney said, 'I think that if the hymen is not ruptured, there is not a sufficient penetration to constitute this offence. I know that there have been cases in which a less degree of penetration has been held to be sufficient; but I have always doubted the authority of those cases; and I have always thought, and still think, that if there is not a sufficient penetration to rupture the hymen, it is not a sufficient penetration to constitute this offence.' (q) But in a similar case, where the surgeon was not able, through the great inflammation that existed, to ascertain whether the hymen had been ruptured or not; Bosanquet, J., (Coleridge and Colman, J.J. being present,) said, 'It is not necessary, in order to complete the offence, that the hymen should be ruptured, provided it is clearly proved that there was penetration; but where that which is so very near to the entrance has not been ruptured, it is very difficult to come to the conclusion that there has been penetration so as to sustain a charge of rape.' (o) Upon this statement the reporters, in a note to Reg. v. Hughes, 9 C. & P. 752, observe, 'The first proposition appears to be much too strongly put, as several cases are mentioned by Dr. Davis (Elem. of Midw. 102), and Dr. Paris (1 Par. & Fomb. Med. Jur. 203), in which the hymen was entire during the pregnancy of the party, and in one case was obliged to be divided by a surgical operation at the time of the accouchement. With respect to the second proposition there may be some doubt, as in all the preparations in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, in which the hymen is shown, it is not more than a quarter of an inch from the orifice of the vagina.'

also in a similar case, where no evidence was given to show that the hymen had been ruptured, and it was urged, on the authority of Rex v. Gammon,^(s) that it was essential that the hymen should have been ruptured, in order to constitute sufficient penetration. Williams, J., said, 'I am of opinion, as matter of law, that it is not essential that the hymen should be ruptured. In the case of Rex v. Gammon, the hymen was ruptured, and the point was not therefore necessary to the decision of that case. I also think that it is impossible to lay down any express rule, as to what constitutes penetration. All I can say is, that the parts of the male must be inserted in those of the female; but I cannot suggest any rule as to the extent.'^(t)

And, lastly, where, on an indictment for a rape, the jury found that there had been penetration, but that the penetration had not proceeded to the rupture of the hymen, Coleridge, J., reserved the point, but on its coming on for argument before the Judges, his lordship said, 'I reserved this case, from respect to my brother Gurney, on account of a dictum of his.'^(u) There is an express decision on this point by the twelve Judges,^(v) and my brother Gurney says that he does not now hold the same opinion. There is, therefore, nothing in the case.'^(w)

But whether or not there must be emissio seminis, in order to constitute a rape, is a point which has been much doubted, and upon which very different opinions have been holden.^(x) The later cases differ also upon this question. Thus, in a case of sodomy, which is governed by the same principles as rape, six Judges held, upon a special verdict, finding penetration but the emission out of the body, that both emission and penetration were necessary; while, on the other hand, five Judges thought that the injectio seminis was not necessary; and they said that injection cannot be proved in the case of a child, or of bestiality, and that penetration may be evidence of emission.^(y) Subsequently to this case, Willes, C. J., presiding at a trial for this offence, adopted the doctrine of the proof of emission being necessary;^(z) but that great crown lawyer, Mr. J. Foster, held otherwise, upon a similar occasion,^(a) as did Clive, J., upon another trial a few years afterwards.^(b) The matter was further considered, in a case where the prosecutrix could not prove any emission; and Bathurst, J., directed the jury, that if they believed that the prisoner had had his will of her, and did not leave her till he chose it himself, they should find him guilty, though an emission were not proved; and after the jury had returned a verdict of guilty, he said, that it was always his opinion, that it was not necessary to prove emission; and Smythe, B., who was present at the trial, was clearly of the same opinion. (c) And in a case which has been before mentioned, where it was agreed that the least degree of penetration was sufficient, it seems that the jury were directed by Ashhurst, J., that if the penetration were proved, the rape was complete in law. (d) The weight of the authorities, therefore, after these cases had been decided, was supposed to be much against the necessity of the proof of emission as well as penetration. (e)

But a more recent case appears to have introduced the contrary doctrine. The case, which was reserved for the opinion of the Judges, stated, that the fact of penetration was positively sworn to; but that there was no direct evidence of emission. From interruption, it appeared probable that emission was not effected; and the jury, under the direction of the learned Judge who tried the prisoner, found a verdict of guilty, but said, that they did not find the emission. Upon this case, three of the Judges (f) held, that the offence was complete by penetration only; but seven of them (g) held both emission and penetration to be necessary: they thought, however, that the fact should be left to the jury. One Judge was absent; (h) and Lord Mansfield only stated, that a great majority seemed to be of opinion that both were necessary. It is said that the majority, in this case, proceeded upon the ground that carnal knowledge (which they considered could not exist without emission) was necessary to the consummation of the offence: but that this definition was denied by the others, who observed that carnal knowledge was not necessary to be laid in the indictment, but only that the defendant ravished the party. (i)

In a later case from the privy council, upon proceedings under a court martial against a seaman for sodomy, it was stated that there was complete penetration and emission; but the emission was out of the body of the person on whom the sodomy was committed; and, upon full consideration, the Judges were of opinion, that injectio seminis was essential; and they stated as their opinion that, upon the authority of what a series of later years had been understood to be the law, and had been acted upon as such, the offence was not complete, and that the prisoner should not have been convicted. (k)

Upon the authority of these cases it seems, therefore, that at one time the offence would not have been considered as complete without some proof of the emissio seminis. But this doctrine is not free from considerable difficulty, and appears to be fairly open to the observation, that where the violence has proceeded to the extent of an actual penetration of the unhappy sufferer's body, an injury of the highest kind has been effected. The quick sense of honour, the pride of virtue, which nature, in order to render the sex amiable, has implanted in the female heart, is violated beyond redemption; and the injurious consequences to society are, in every respect, complete. (l)

Supposing, however, that emission were necessary, it seems that penetration was primâ facie evidence of it, unless the contrary appeared probable from the circumstances. (m) Thus, where a woman swore that the defendant had his will with her, and had remained on her body as long as he pleased, but could not speak as to emission, Buller, J., said, that it was sufficient evidence of a rape to be left to the jury. (n) And he mentioned a case, which he recollected, of an indictment for a rape, where the woman had sworn that she did not perceive anything come from the man, and that, though she had had many children, she never was in her life sensible of emission from a man; and that this was ruled not to invalidate the evidence which she gave of a rape having been committed upon her. In a case where the party ravished had died before the trial, her deposition, corroborated by other evidence of actual force and penetration, was held sufficient to warrant a conviction, though there did not appear to be any direct evidence of emission. It was left to the jury to determine whether the crime had been completed by penetration and emission; and they were directed that they might collect the fact of emission from the evidence, though the unfortunate girl was dead, and could not therefore give any further account of the transaction than that which was contained in her deposition before the magistrate. (o)

If something occurred to create an alarm to the party while he was perpetrating the offence, it was left to the jury to say whether he left the body re infectâ because of the alarm, or whether he left it because his purpose was accomplished. The prisoner had been in the body of the woman two or three minutes; and then, two men coming in sight, she struggled violently, and he withdrew from her body, but jumped with his knees upon her breast, and held her by the mouth and throat so that she could not speak or stir; but afterwards, upon her seizing an opportunity and calling out, the men came up and secured the prisoner. The woman spoke of him as having seen the men before he withdrew; the men thought he did not see them at that time. Holroyd, J., left the question to the jury, whether the prisoner had completed the crime before he withdrew, and withdrew on that account; and the jury found that he had. And the Judges held, that it was a question for the jury, and rightly left to them. (p)

Holroyd, J., is reported to have told the jury in the preceding case, 'the law requires that in order to consummate the crime of rape, there must not only be a penetration, but likewise what is called an emission of semen. But, although the woman may not perceive the emission, the crime may nevertheless be complete, as Penetration was primâ facie evidence of emission.

If the party were disturbed it was for the jury to say whether he withdrew re infectâ, or because he had completed his purpose.

where the time is fully sufficient, and there is no interruption, or other circumstance, to raise a contrary presumption. Emission in fact may be presumed, unless where the probability is to the contrary; and the jury may be left to say whether the party left the body re infectâ, by reason of a disturbance, or because his purpose was completed. If a person in actu coitus be alarmed by the sudden appearance of third persons, and if his withdrawing from the body of the female be contemporaneous with such alarm, it is for the jury to say, whether his withdrawing was in consequence of the alarm, or because he had completed his purpose by emission.' (g)

ledge defined.

But by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 63, 'Whenever, upon the trial for any offence punishable under this Act, it may be necessary to prove carnal knowledge, it shall not be necessary to prove the actual emission of seed in order to constitute a carnal knowledge, but the carnal knowledge shall be deemed complete upon proof of penetration only.' (r)

There was much discrepancy of opinion whether the effect of the clause in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, from which the preceding clause was taken, was to alter the crime of rape, or merely the mode of proving that crime. In the earlier cases it was held to have made no difference in the crime. Thus, where a prisoner was indicted for a rape, and it appeared that he was caught in the commission of the offence by a person, who came to the room-door in which he was, but the prosecutrix swore that he did not immediately desist; Park, J. A. J., said, 'Notwithstanding the new statute, I should still say, that if it could be shown that a party desisted before he had completed his purpose, it was not a rape; I cannot conceive in my own mind that the mere fact of penetration is sufficient to constitute the offence; but here he did not immediately desist.' (s) So in a similar case where the prosecutrix proved penetration clearly, but stated that she did not feel anything come from the prisoner; Taunton, J., said, 'In order to complete the offence it is necessary that he should have had carnal knowledge of her, and that all which constitutes carnal knowledge should have happened. Though the enactment of the statute is such as has been stated, still the jury must be satisfied from the circumstances that emission took place. It is not necessary specifically to prove it, but the circumstances must be such as infer that that fact, and everything else essential to carnal knowledge, took place. The statute did not intend to make less necessary to complete the offence than before, but merely to prevent the necessity of the indecent exposure resulting from the minute inquiries which usually took place. The jury, therefore, must be satisfied that emission occurred before they can convict.' (t) So also in a similar case, where the prosecutrix proved penetration, and that her clothes were wet, Alderson, B., thus addressed the jury: 'You must be satisfied that the prisoner penetrated her private parts with his; if you are satisfied of that, I shall submit to your consideration another question; according to law it is established, beyond all doubt, that on proof of penetration, a jury may infer the completion of the offence; the offence still consisting of penetration and emission; but doubt has arisen upon a late Act of Parliament, whether when no emission has taken place, the offence is complete by penetration only. I have no doubt, however, that it is for you, if you are of opinion that there has been penetration, to presume emission, unless the contrary is proved; and it lies on the prisoner to show that emission did not take place. If you are satisfied of penetration, but that no emission did take place, I will reserve the question for the Judges; but if you are convinced of penetration, and in doubt or ignorance whether emission took place, I am clear you ought to find the prisoner guilty.' (u)

But on a similar indictment, where there was evidence of penetration, but no evidence of emission, Hullock, B., said (in summing up), 'If you believe that the prisoner's parts were within the person of the prosecutrix, although there might be no emission, and although they were not withdrawn merely because his lust was satisfied, still the prisoner is equally guilty as if there had been emission, and he had been satisfied; for, as the law now stands, penetration is all that is necessary to be proved to make out the offence.' (x) And where on an indictment for abusing a child under the age of ten years; in consequence of Rex v. Russell, (w) and Coulthart's case, (x) Littledale, J., left the question of penetration and also of emission to the jury, and desired them, in case they should be of opinion that penetration had taken place, but were uncertain whether emission had taken place, or not, they should say so, and the jury found the prisoner guilty, and said they were of opinion that penetration took place, but that no emission took place. Upon a case reserved, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. (y) So, where, upon an indictment for sodomy, the prosecutor proved circumstances which were strong to show penetration, and distinctly proved emission, but not during penetration, the prisoner having been interrupted; Gaselee, J., left it to the jury to say whether there had been penetration, stating that, if so, the crime was complete under the new Act; and the jury were of opinion that there had been, and found the prisoner guilty, and sentence was passed, but in consequence of Rex v. Jacobs, (z) and Rex v. Russell, (a) the case was reserved for the opinion of the Judges, who held unanimously that the conviction was right. (b) So in a case of bestiality, where the prisoner being interrupted, withdrew from the animal; Park, J. A. J., said, 'In the former state of the law, the prisoner would have been entitled to an acquittal, but, as the law is now, if there was penetration, the capital offence is completed, although there has been no emission.' (c) Where on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix admitted that the prisoner had penetrated but a little way, and that there was no emission; and it was objected that the direct negative being proved, the case failed, and that the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, had not altered the character of the offence; Patteson, J., said, 'The Judges have distinctly held in Cox's case, (d) that proof of penetration is sufficient, notwithstanding emission be negatived;' and upon its being suggested that Cox's case was not argued, and that doubts as to the propriety of the decision were said to be entertained by two Judges, who were absent, Patteson, J., said, 'It is true that the case was not argued, but still I cannot act against their decision.' The learned Judge afterwards said that if it should prove necessary, the case should be further considered. (e) And lastly, where on a trial for a rape there was no doubt that there was penetration, but it appeared clear from the admissions of the prosecutrix that the prisoner did not in fact complete his purpose, as she succeeded in extricating herself from him very soon; and it was contended that the evidence showed that the offence was not completed; the words of the indictment were, 'did ravish and carnally know,' and that must mean, did have his will of her, and satisfy his lust while within her person. The object of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, was only to render it unnecessary to prove more than penetration, on account of the woman's possible inability to describe what actually took place. The counsel for the crown, in reply, agreed with the counsel for the prisoner, that the Act was not intended to do more than enable a jury to say that the offence was committed, when there was only proof of penetration; but that it was not intended to dispense with proof of the completion of the offence, when such proof can be given, still less to decide that the offence shall be considered to have been committed in point of law, when the evidence clearly shows that it was not committed in point of fact. Tindal, C. J.: 'The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 18, recites, that upon trials of rape, &c., "offenders frequently escape by reason of the difficulty of the proof which has been required of the completion of those several crimes." It was thought that the law was holding itself up to contempt by having those subtle and critical subjects discussed before Judges and juries, and the statute therefore goes on to say, "For remedy thereof, be it enacted, that it shall not be necessary, in any of those cases, to prove the actual emission of seed, in order to constitute carnal knowledge; but the carnal knowledge shall be deemed complete upon proof of penetration only." The only question, therefore, for the jury in such a case is, whether the private parts of the man did enter into the person of the woman. It is not necessary to enter into any nice discussion as to how far they entered; however, you must be satisfied that there was actual penetration, and not that it is the case of a person attempting to commit the offence and being disturbed before he had actually penetrated. The prosecutrix may be mistaken as to the extent to which the prisoner had proceeded in the commission of the offence ; if, therefore, you feel any doubt whether (and I can use no other words than the statute ; I am not here to make the law, but only to expound and declare it), if, I say, you feel any doubt whether it has been proved to your entire satisfaction that there has been penetration, you will acquit the prisoner of the felony.' (f) So where on a trial for carnally knowing a child

(f) Reg. v. Allen, 9 C. & P. 31. I have inserted these cases more at length in consequence of great doubts being entertained among the Bar as to the correctness of the decision in Rex v. Cox, and the cases that have been decided on the authority of that case. At the time when the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, passed, it is perfectly clear that in order to constitute the crime of rape there must have been both penetration and emission; consequently, it lay upon the prosecutor either to give express evidence of actual emission, or to prove such facts as were sufficient to induce the jury to infer that emission had actually taken place. In some cases the woman was unable to prove emission, either because she did not perceive it (see ante, p. 915), or (as was the case in Rex v. Preston, Stafford Spr. Ass. 1828, where a father was convicted of ravishing two of his daughters) because after penetration she fainted away. In such cases it was the course to leave it to the jury to infer that emission had taken place, as there was nothing to show that the prisoner had not fully completed his purpose; and acquittals sometimes took place because juries were unwilling to infer a fact, which had not been clearly proved, especially when such an inference subjected the prisoner to capital punishment. Such being the state of things, the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, passed; and the question is whether that Act has altered the crime of rape, so that instead of consisting of both penetration and emission, it now consists of penetration alone. According to all the recent decisions (see Rex v. Great Bentley, 10 B. & C. 520; Williams v. Roberts, 5 Tyrw. 421; Flight v. Thomas, 11 Ad. & E. 688,) this ought to be determined upon the grammatical construction of the words of the statute alone. In sec. 16, there is a separate substantive clause providing that 'every person convicted of the crime of rape shall suffer death as a felon.' Now here the crime is treated as one as clearly settled and defined as the crime of murder, i. e., as consisting of both penetration and emission. It is, however, upon sec. 18 that the question mainly turns. That section recites, that 'upon trials for the crimes (inter alia) of rape, offenders' (that is, persons guilty of those crimes), 'frequently escape by reason of the difficulty of the proof which has been required of the completion of those several crimes' (the mischief, therefore, was that persons who had committed rapes, consisting both of penetration and emission, had escaped by reason of the difficulty of proving both penetration and emission), 'for remedy thereof' (that is to remedy the escape of persons who had committed such rapes consisting of both penetration and emission), 'be it enacted that it shall not be necessary in any of those cases to prove the actual emission of seed' (not that emission shall be no part of the crime) 'but that the carnal knowledge' (i. e. both penetration and emission) 'shall be deemed' (presumed) 'complete upon proof of penetration only.' Now, it is to be observed that there is no intimation whatever of any intention to alter the crime; on the contrary, the clause evidently treats the crime as continuing the same, but is framed to render the means of proving it more easy. It is submitted that upon the true construction of this clause its effect is that, whereas before the passing of the statute the prosecutor was bound not only to prove penetration, but to go farther, and give such evidence as satisfied the jury that emission had actually taken place, he is now only bound to prove penetration; on proof of which a presumption arises by virtue of the clause that emission has also taken place, but that this presumption is liable to be rebutted by showing that in fact emission did not take place. In other words, all the prosecutor has now to prove is penetration, and upon that the jury ought to convict, unless it be proved by the prisoner that he did not in fact complete his purpose. This is the view which seems to have been taken by Mr. B. Alderson in Coulthart's case [supra, note (u), p. 917], and it is submitted is the correct construction of the clause. There are several statutory provisions of a somewhat similar character, as the 23 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 3, for remedying the difficulties attending prosecutions for perjury, and the statutes which make a certificate of the clerk of assize evidence of a previous conviction, &c., and it is evident that none of these alter the offence, but only facilitate the proof of it. At all events the clause does not clearly alter the crime, and it is against all the authorities to hold that a felony can be created by any but express and clear words. In Searle v. Williams, Hob. 293, it is laid down that 'felonies and capital crimes shall never be made by doubtful and ambiguous words.' And in Courteen's case, Hob. 270, it was 'resolved clearly that no statute could be extended to life by doubtful and ambigu-

under ten years of age, it appeared that the hymen was not ruptured, but there was a venereal sore on it, which must have arisen from the actual contact with the virile member of a man; Parke, B., left it to the jury to say whether at any time any part of the virile member of the prisoner was within the labia of the pudendum of the girl; for if ever it was, no matter how little, that would be sufficient to constitute a penetration, and the jury ought to convict the prisoner of the complete offence (g)

It appears always to have been admitted, that emissio seminis of itself makes neither rape nor sodomy; but it is spoken of as primâ facie evidence of penetration. (h)

Of the indictment.

As the absence of previous consent is a material ingredient in the offence of rape, it must be averred in the indictment; where it is usually expressed by stating that the fact was done 'against the will' of the party. (i) It is essential to aver, that the offender did feloniously 'ravish' the party; and the omission of the word ravished will not be supplied by an averment that the offender 'did carnally know,' &c. (h) It has been considered, that the words 'did carnally know' are not essential, on the ground that rapere signifies legally as much as carnaliter cognoscere; (l) but they are at any rate appropriate in describing the nature of the crime, and appear to be generally used. (m) The omission of them would not, therefore, be prudent. (n) In an indictment for a rape the words carnaliter cognovit were omitted; on a case reserved, six Judges out of twelve thought it cured by the verdict, because those words are not in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; but they thought it bad before verdict. (o) Where an indictment alleged that the prisoner in and upon E. F. 'violently and feloniously did make (omitting 'an assault'), and her the said E. F., then and there and against her will, violently and feloniously did ravish and carnally know;' upon a case reserved, ten of the Judges were of opinion that the judgment ought not to be arrested, because of the omission of the words 'an assault.' (p) The indictment usually use the words: and see 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 40, s. 3. In Rex v. Cale, R. & M. C. C. R. 11, it was held by a majority of the Judges that the 3 Geo. 4, c. 24, s. 3, which provided that the receiving stolen goods should be 'deemed and construed to be felony,' did not create a felony, and although that case be overruled by Rex v. Solomons, R. & M. C. C. R. 292, still it is a strong authority to show how clear and distinct the words which create a new felony are required to be, even where the words be such as to leave no doubt that it was intended to create such felony. It may be added that the decision in Rex v. Cox gives a great facility to convict the innocent in those cases, which not unfrequently occur, where the parties being accidentally discovered in coitu, the woman makes a false charge in order to save her character. concludes, 'against the form of the statute;' but as the offence was anciently, as has been shown, (q) a capital felony, such a conclusion has been thought to be unnecessary. (r) The indictment must conclude, as in other cases, 'against the peace,' &c.; (s) but where the conclusion was against the peace of our said late lord the King, the offence being in the time of the present King, and no other King had been mentioned, it was held not to be objectionable. (t)

The indictment against aiders and abettors may lay the fact to have been done by all, or may charge it as having been done by one and abetted by the rest. Thus where, upon an appeal against several persons for ravishing the appellant's wife, an objection was taken that only one should have been charged as ravishing, and the others as accessories; or that there should have been several appeals, as the ravishing by one would not be the ravishing of the others: it was answered that if two come to ravish, and one by comfort of the other does the act, both are principals, and the case proceeded. (u) And where the indictment was against three persons for a rape, charging them all as principals in the first degree, that they ravished and carnally knew the woman; and the prisoners were all found guilty; the Judge who tried them doubted whether the charge could be supported; and, at his desire, the case was mentioned by Heath, J., to the other Judges, and all who were present agreed that the charge was valid, though the form was not to be recommended; but they gave no regular opinion, because the case was not regularly before them. (v)

and abettors.

An indictment in the first count charged Folkes with committing a rape, and Ludds with being present, aiding and assisting; the second count charged Ludds as principal in the first degree, and Folkes as aiding and assisting; the third count charged an evil-disposed person, to the jurors unknown, as principal in the first degree, and Folkes and Ludds as aiding and assisting; and the fourth count charged a certain other evil-disposed person as principal, and Folkes and Ludds as aiders. Previous to pleading, the Court was urged to quash the indictment on the ground that it was bad for misjoinder of two offences of a different nature, and not liable to the same punishment, and that for aiding and abetting no provision was made by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31. It was also alleged that the indictment contained different transactions, and that the prosecutrix was bound to make an election. The Court overruled both objections. Ludds was acquitted, and a general verdict of guilty was found against Folkes. It appeared that the prisoner, together with three other men, committed at the same time and place, the one after the other, successively, rapes upon the body of the prosecutrix, the others aiding and abetting in turn; and the evidence, if believed, was sufficient to sustain the first count, as far as it charged Folkes as principal, as the other counts which charged him as aiding and assisting; and, upon a case reserved, the Judges held that the conviction was good on the first count. (w) Where the first count charged Gray as principal in the first degree, and Wise as present, aiding and assisting; and the second count charged Wise as principal in the first degree, and Gray as present, aiding and assisting; it was moved to quash the indictment, on the ground of misjoinder, as the judgment might be different, and it was said that this objection did not ultimately become material in the preceding case, as one prisoner alone was convicted; but per Coleridge, J., 'The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 16, awards the punishment of death to "every person convicted of the crime of rape." Now, I take it that a principal in the second degree falls clearly within that provision; and that, therefore, the objection that the judgment might be different entirely fails.' (x)

The party ravished is a competent witness.

It is clear that the party ravished is a competent witness: and indeed, she is so much considered as a witness of necessity, that where a husband has been charged with having assisted another man in ravishing his own wife, the wife has been admitted as a witness against her husband. (y)

But her credibility is to be left to the jury upon the concurring circumstances.

But though the party ravished is a competent witness, the credibility of her testimony must be left to the jury, upon the circumstances of fact which concur with that testimony. Thus, if she be of good fame; if she presently discovered the offence, and made search for the offender; if she showed circumstances and signs of the injury, whereof many are of that nature that women only are proper examiners; if the place where the fact was done were remote from inhabitants or passengers; if the party accused fled for it; these, and the like, are concurring circumstances, which give greater probability to her evidence. (z) But if, on the other hand, the witness be of evil fame, and stand unsupported by others; if, without being under control, or the influence of fear, she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had the opportunity of complaining; if the place where the fact is alleged to have been committed, was near to persons by whom she might probably have been heard, and yet she made no outcry; if she has given wrong descriptions of the place; these, and the like circumstances, afford a strong, though not conclusive, presumption that her testimony is feigned. (a)

(w) Rex v. Folkes, R. & M. C. C. R. 354. There is an inaccuracy in the statement of this case; it treats the charge against the principal in the first degree as one count, and the charge against the principal in the second degree as another count; but that is not so, as both charges only constitute one count, as is plain from the indictments in murder, in which the conclusion, 'and so the jurors, &c., say, that A., B., and C. murdered,' always follows the allegation that B. and C. were present, aiding and assisting. to permit either the prosecutrix, or the person so called, to state the particulars of the complaint, during the examination in chief. (b) Upon this practice, in a case where a witness was proceeding to state the particulars of the complaint, when the prisoner's counsel interposed, Parke, B., observed, 'The sense of the thing certainly is, that the jury should, in the first instance, know the nature of the complaint, made by the prosecutrix, and all that she then said. But for reasons, which I could never understand, the usage has obtained that the prosecutrix's counsel should only inquire generally, whether a complaint was made by the prosecutrix of the prisoner's conduct towards her, leaving the counsel of the latter to bring before the jury the particulars of that complaint, by cross-examination.' And the witness was, accordingly, only permitted to prove generally that the prosecutrix complained to her of the ill-treatment she had experienced from the prisoner. (c) plaint is evidence, but the particulars of such complaint are not.

But where on a trial for rape the prosecutrix said, that very soon after the alleged offence, as she was returning home she had complained to Mrs. P., and Mrs. P., being called, was asked whether the prosecutrix made any complaint, and was directed to answer 'yes' or 'no;' and on her answering 'yes,' she was asked whether the prosecutrix named any particular person, and the witness, being directed to answer 'yes' or 'no,' answered 'yes;' it was then asked whose name was mentioned, but it was objected that this question could not be put: the rule was that the fact of a complaint having been made was admissible, but not the particulars of it. Cresswell, J.: 'What the prosecutrix said at the time of committing the offence, would be receivable in evidence on the grounds that the prisoner was present and the violence going on; but if the violence was over and the prisoner had departed, and the prosecutrix had gone on running away, crying out the name of the person, it would not be evidence. I think that the case of Rex v. Wink (d) is a direct authority in point; but I own that my mind is not convinced as to the latter part of that case, as it seems to me to be rather too refined a distinction to prevent the name from being mentioned, and yet to permit it to be asked, whether, in consequence of what was said, the witness apprehended a particular person. I think you ought not to go so far as that; and that the question, "whose name was mentioned?" ought not to be asked.' (e)

(b) Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. N. P. C. 241. 3 Stark. Evid. 951.

(c) Reg. v. Walker, 2 M. & Rob. 212. It should seem that the grounds, upon which the making the complaint may be proved, but not the particulars of it, are, that the making the complaint is a fact, but the particulars of it are mere statements neither made on oath nor in the presence of the prisoner. In Rex v. Wink, 6 C. & P. 397, Patteson, J., held that a party, who had been robbed, might be asked if he named any person as the person who had robbed him to a constable, but that he ought not to be asked what name he mentioned. This seems at variance with Reg. v. Walker, because there it appears that the witness was allowed to prove a complaint of the conduct of the prisoner: now, that is proving one particular, and perhaps the most important particular of the whole. The practice, certainly, has been merely to ask whether a complaint was made, and only to permit the witness to answer 'yes,' or 'no.' The ground upon which the prisoner's counsel is entitled to ask what the particulars of the complaint were, is, that he has a right to inquire into any statement made by the prosecutrix, relative to the transaction, if he think fit, in order to ascertain whether she has, at all times, told the same story. C. S. G.

(e) Reg. v. Osborne, C. & M. 622.

But where on a trial for rape the prosecutrix was asked in her examination in chief whether she had made any complaint, and she said she had to certain persons; she was then asked 'what did you say?' whereupon it was objected; but Byles, J., said, 'Whatever she said immediately after the occasion, and what was said to her in answer, is equally evidence. It may be, for particular reasons, that neither the counsel for the prosecutrix, nor the prisoner may like to ask the question as to what was said to her; but it is my duty as judge to stand independent between the prisoner and the Crown, and I should not shrink from asking the question myself.' (f)

Where the party ravished is dead, the particulars of her complaint are not admissible.

Where the party ravished has died before the trial, it is not competent to prove the particulars of a complaint made by her soon after the offence was committed, with a view of showing who the parties were who committed it. Upon a trial for rape, after the death of the prosecutrix, it appeared that as soon as she returned home on the morning, on which it was alleged that the offence was committed, she made a complaint of what had happened to her, and it was proposed, on the part of the prosecution, to ask the terms of the complaint. Rolfe, B.: 'There is a wide difference between receiving such statements, as confirmatory of a prosecutrix's credibility in a charge of rape, on which she is examined as a witness, and in a case like the present, where the complaint is to be received as independent evidence. I entertain very great doubts indeed as to the admissibility of such evidence.' The evidence was not given: and, in summing up, the learned Baron said, 'I had a strong feeling that it was not competent to the prosecutor to extract, in detail, the complaint made by the deceased on her return home. In ordinary cases of rape, where a witness describes the outrage in the witness-box, evidence of her complaint soon after the occurrence of the outrage, is properly admissible, to show her credit, and the accuracy of her recollection. Here, however, the object is to give in evidence the particulars of the complaint, as independent evidence, with a view of showing who were the persons who committed the offence. All that could safely be received was, I think, her complaint that a dreadful outrage had been perpetrated upon her.' (g)

Where the prosecutrix is absent, evidence of a complaint made by her is not admissible.

So where the prosecutrix is absent, it is not competent to prove that she made a complaint soon after the occurrence; for such evidence is merely confirmatory of the story of the prosecutrix, and no part of the res gestæ. Upon an indictment for rape, where the prosecutrix did not appear, on the part of the prosecution it was proposed to ask a witness whether the prosecutrix did not complain to her the next day: it was objected that the evidence of recent complaint is received to confirm the evidence of the prosecutrix, but as she was away, her evidence was not before the jury to be confirmed. Parke, B.: 'In Brazier's case, (h) the child who was attempted to be ravished was only five years old, and incapable of taking an oath, and it was there held, that the complaints she made to her mother and another woman, on her coming home, were receivable in evidence, as she herself was not heard on oath. What a man says as complaint to his surgeon is evidence.' 'I think the safest course will be to reject the evidence, as it is not part of the res gestæ, but merely confirmatory evidence. At the time of Brazier's case, it seems to have been considered, that, as the child was incompetent to take an oath, what she said was receivable in evidence. The law was not so well settled then as it is now.' (i) So where on an indictment for abusing a child under ten years of age, the child was wholly ignorant of the nature of an oath, and therefore not examined, and it was proposed to give evidence of a statement made by her relative to the offence, and the name of the person who committed it; Pollock, C. B., refused to admit it, observing, 'If a man says to his surgeon, "I have a pain in my head," or a pain in such a part of the body, that is evidence; but if he says to his surgeon, "I have a wound," and adds, "I met John Thomas, who had a sword, and ran me through the body with it," that would be no evidence against John Thomas: and it is certainly a very odd reason for receiving the evidence of what a child has said, that that child is not capable of taking an oath.' (k)

The character of the prosecutrix, as to general chastity, may be impeached by general evidence, (l) as by showing her general light character, and giving general evidence of her being a street walker. (m) But, in a case where a question was put to a prosecutrix, 'Whether she had not before had connection with other persons; and whether she had not before had connection with a particular person who was named;' an objection taken to this question by the counsel for the prosecution was allowed by the learned Judge; who also allowed an objection, made by the counsel for the prosecution, to the admissibility of evidence to prove that the girl had been caught in bed, about a year before this charge was preferred, with a young man who was tendered by the prisoner's counsel to prove that he had had connection with her: and the question as to the admissibility of such evidence being reserved, eight Judges, who were present at the discussion, held that both the objections were properly allowed. (n)

On a trial for rape upon a child between ten and twelve years of age, the witness for the prosecution was cross-examined as to particular facts of indecency on the part of the prosecutrix, and of solicitation by her previously made to men to have connection with her, and witnesses were called to prove these facts; but Lord Abinger, C. B., objected to their being examined, referring to a case (evidently Rex v. Hodgson) where such a course was disallowed, but saying that that ruling gave so much dissatisfaction that the Attorney-General recommended a pardon, which was granted; and afterwards, on the authority of Rex v. Clarke, (o) his lordship allowed witnesses to be called to prove general want of decency in the prosecutrix, and then permitted the prosecutrix to call witnesses to rebut their evidence. (p)

But it has since been holden, that a prosecutrix may be asked questions as to particular criminal or discreditable acts. As, 'Were you not walking in the High-street with a common prostitute?' (q) So, also, whether the prisoner had not previously had connection with her, by her own consent? (r) So in an action for seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, she may be cross-examined as to particular acts of intercourse with other men, and, if she deny them, then such persons may be called to contradict her, and may be asked as to the fact and the time and place of its occurrence. (s) So on an indictment for rape, where the prosecutrix, on cross-examination, denied that she had had connection with several men who were shown to her at the time she was questioned, Coleridge, J., after consulting Erskine, J., held that these persons might be called to prove that they had had connection with her; for it was not immaterial to the question whether the prosecutrix had had this connection against her consent, to show that she had permitted other men to have connection with her, which she had denied. (t)

But where, on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix was cross-examined as to a charge of stealing money from a former mistress, and as to the account she had given of the money found in her possession to a constable, and she said that she told the constable a gentleman had given it her for not telling of his insulting her, and denied that she had told him that it was given her by the gentleman for having connection with her; it was held that the constable could not be called to contradict her, and to prove that she told him the gentleman had given her the money for having connection with her. (u)

The application of these and other rules upon this difficult subject should always be made with due regard to the cautious observations of a great and experienced Judge. Lord Hale says, 'It is true, that rape is a most detestable crime, and therefore ought severely and impartially to be punished with death; but it must be remembered, that it is an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused, though never so innocent.' (v) He then mentions two remarkable cases of malicious prosecution for this crime, that had come within his own knowledge: and concludes, 'I mention these instances, that we may be the more cautious upon trials of offences of this nature, wherein the court and jury may, with so much ease, be imposed upon without great care and vigilance: the heinousness of the offence many times transporting the judge and jury with so much indignation, that they are over-hastily carried to the conviction of the person accused thereof, by the confident testimony, sometimes, of malicious and false witnesses.' clothes were washed by a washerwoman, and they had blood on them; Pollock, C. B., directed these persons to be called as witnesses for the prosecution, although they were attending as witnesses for the prisoner, but allowed the counsel for the prosecution all latitude in examining them. (x)

On a trial for rape it was proposed on the part of the prosecution to ask a witness for the defence as to something that had been said by a relative of the prosecutrix to a relative of the prisoner, in the presence of the prosecutrix, about making it up; it was objected that evidence of a conversation between third persons, not made in the presence of the prisoner, was inadmissible. Martin, B.: 'In a civil case, what is said in the presence of either of the parties is admissible, because it is open to the party so present to express assent or dissent to what is said, and that would be admissible against him. In criminal cases, the prosecutor, although not in strict law a party to the case, is so in fact; and I think that the rule applicable to conversation in the presence of a party in a civil case may be fairly extended to a conversation in the presence of the prosecutor in a criminal case.' (y)

It has already been shown that this offence is now punishable by penal servitude for life. (z) By the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 67, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, is punishable in the same manner as a principal in the first degree; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act (except murder), is liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. (a)

Upon an indictment for a rape, a prisoner may be convicted under the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 100, s. 9, of an attempt to commit the same, and thereupon will be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for attempting to commit the rape. (b)

It may be as well to observe, that by the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 56, s. 6, the crime of rape shall not 'be tried, or triable, before any justices of the peace, at any general or quarter sessions of the peace.'

Where there is no reason to expect that the facts and circumstances of the case, when given in evidence, will establish that the crime of rape has been completed, the proper course will be, to prefer an indictment at common law, for an assault with intent to ravish; which offence, though only a misdemeanor, yet is one of a very aggravated nature, and has, in many instances, been visited with exemplary punishment. (c) Formerly where, upon an indictment for an assault with intent to commit a rape, the prosecutrix proved a rape actually committed, an acquittal would have been directed, on the ground that the misdemeanor was merged in the felony. (d) But now by the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 100, s. 12, (d) Rex v. Harmwood, cor. Buller, J., Winchester Spr. Ass. 1787, 1 East, P. C.

‘if upon the trial of any person for any misdemeanor it shall appear that the facts given in evidence amount in law to a felony, such person shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted of such misdemeanor; and no person tried for such misdemeanor shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for felony on the same facts, unless the Court, before which such trial may be had, shall think fit, in its discretion, to discharge the jury from giving any verdict upon such trial, and to direct such person to be indicted for felony, in which case, such person may be dealt with in all respects as if he had not been put upon his trial for such misdemeanor.’

The prisoner must intend, at all events, to have connection.

In order to convict of such an assault, the jury must be satisfied that the prisoner intended to gratify his passions, on the person of the prosecutrix, at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part. Upon an indictment for an assault, with intent to commit a rape, Patterson, J., in summing up, said, ‘In order to find the prisoner guilty of an assault, with intent to commit a rape, you must be satisfied that the prisoner, when he laid hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part.’ (e)

It was held by the same very learned Judge, in the same case, that evidence that the prisoner, on a prior occasion, had taken liberties with the prosecutrix, was not admissible, to show the prisoner’s intent. (f)

Under a count for an assault, with intent to commit a rape, a prisoner may be convicted of a common assault. (g) But on an indictment, containing a count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and a count for a common assault, if the prisoner be acquitted on the count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, on the ground that the prosecutrix consented, he cannot be convicted on the count for a common assault: for to support that count such an assault must be proved as could not be justified if an action were brought for it, and leave and license pleaded. (h)

Several counts.

An indictment may contain two counts for two different attempts to commit a rape on the same female, and evidence of both may be given on the trial. (i) And where one count charged the prisoner with an attempt to commit a rape, and another count charged him with an assault, and the record stated that the jury found him ‘guilty of the misdemeanor and offence in the said indictment specified,’ and it was adjudged that ‘for the said misdemeanor,’ he shall be imprisoned for two years and kept to hard labour; it was held, upon error, that the word ‘misdemeanor’ was nomen collectivum, and therefore the finding of the jury was in effect that the prisoner was guilty of the whole matter charged by the indictment, and consequently the judgment was warranted by the verdict. SEC. II.

Of the unlawful Carnal Knowledge of Female Children.

IN rape, as we have seen, the carnal knowledge must be against the will of the party; but, by the 18 Eliz., c. 7, carnal knowledge of any woman-child under the age of ten years, was made felony without benefit of clergy; and this without any reference to the consent or non-consent of the child, which was therefore considered as immaterial.

The carnal knowledge of a child under ten years old was felony by 18 Eliz. c. 7, now repealed.

It appears at one time to have been thought, that the carnal knowledge of a child above the age of ten and under twelve years was rape, though she consented: twelve years being the age of consent in a female, and the statute Westm. 1, c. 13, which enacted, 'That none do ravish any maiden within age, neither by her own consent nor without,' being admitted to refer, by the words 'within age,' to the age of twelve years. (o) It was, however, afterwards well established, that if the child was above ten years old it was not a rape, unless it was against her consent. (p) But children above that age, and under twelve, were within the protection of the statute of Westm. 1, c. 13, the law with respect to the carnal knowledge of such children not having been altered by either of the subsequent statutes of Westm. 2, c. 34, or 18 Eliz. c. 7. The statute Westm. 1, c. 13, made the deflowering a child above ten years old, and under twelve, though with her own consent, a misdemeanor punishable by two years' imprisonment, and fine at the King's pleasure. (q)

The carnal knowledge of a child above ten and under twelve years old was a misdemeanor by stat. of Westm. 1, c. 13.

These statutes, and the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, are now repealed; and by the 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 50, 'whosoever shall unlawfully and carnally know and abuse any girl under the age of ten years shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' Indictment on 18 Eliz. c. 7.

Proof of the age of the child.

Sec. 51. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and carnally know and abuse any girl being above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (s)

Sec. 52. 'Whosoever shall be convicted of any indecent assault upon any female, or of any attempt to have carnal knowledge of any girl under twelve years of age, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (t)

Upon an indictment on either sec. 50 or sec. 51, the prisoner may, under the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 100, s. 9, be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence with which he is charged. (u)

It was said, that an indictment on the 18 Eliz., c. 7, for deflowering a child under ten years of age, ought to conclude 'against the form of the statute,' because the crime, as well as the punishment, was created by that statute. (v) And that, on the same account, it was necessary for the indictment to pursue the words of the Act, and charge that the defendant feloniously, unlawfully, and carnally, knew and abused the party, being under the age of ten years, without adding the word ravished. (w) These observations seem equally applicable to an indictment on the present statute.

Clear and distinct evidence ought to be given that the child is under ten years of age. Thus, where the offence of carnally knowing a child under ten years of age was charged to have been committed on the 5th of February, 1832, and the only evidence of the age of the child was given by the father, who stated that in February, 1822, he went from home for a few days, and that his wife had not then been confined, and that on his return on the 9th of the same month, he found the child had been born, and he was told by his wife's mother that it had been born the day before; the grandmother was alive at the time of the trial, but the mother was dead. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient, and that the grandmother ought to have been called, for in a matter of so much importance the best evidence ought to be adduced. (x) So, on a similar indictment, evidence by the child herself that she was ten years old on a particular day, her mother being ill at home, and her father being unable to state the precise time of her birth, has been held insufficient. (y) But where on an indictment for carnally knowing a child under ten years of age the mother stated that she had never kept any account of the child's age, but that her knowledge of it was derived from hearing her husband speak of it, and from conversation with him and the child, and that it had been usual to keep the birthday of the child on the 7th of February, and there was no other evidence of the age; it was objected that more certain evidence of the age ought to have been produced, and Rex v. Wedge (z) was relied upon; Coltman, J., however, observed, that 'the evidence in that case was mere hearsay; but this evidence went much farther, and must be submitted to the jury as some evidence, though open to observation, as to the child's age.' (a)

A boy under fourteen years of age cannot be convicted of this offence, and evidence is not admissible to prove that he has arrived at the full state of puberty. (b)

Upon prosecutions for this offence, it is an important consideration how far the child, upon whom the injury has been committed, is a competent witness. In former times, the competency appears to have been made to depend upon the age of the child; and when the rule prevailed that no children could be admitted as witnesses under the age of nine years, and very few under ten, (c) the testimony of the injured child must have been for the most part excluded. A more reasonable rule has, however, been since adopted; and it appears now to be well established, that a child of any age, if capable of distinguishing between good and evil, may be examined upon oath: but that, whatever may be its age, it cannot be examined unless sworn. (d) By such capability of distinguishing between good and evil, must be understood a belief in God, or in a future state of rewards and punishments; from which the Court may be satisfied that the witness entertains a proper sense of the danger and impiety of falsehood. (e)

It appears to have been allowed, that the fact of the child's having complained of the injury recently after it was received, is confirmatory evidence: (f) but where the child is not fit to be sworn, it is clear that any account which it may have given to others ought not to be received. (g) Thus, on an indictment for a rape on a child of five years of age, where the child was not examined, but an account of what she had told her mother about three weeks after the transaction was given in evidence by the mother; and the jury convicted the prisoner principally, as was supposed, on that evidence: the Judges, on a case reserved, thought the evidence clearly inadmissible; and the prisoner was accordingly pardoned. (h)

In all cases of this kind, it is undoubtedly much to be wished that, in order to render the evidence of the child credible, there should be some concurrent testimony of time, place, and circumstances, in order to make out the fact; and that the conviction should not be grounded singly on the unsupported accusation of an infant under years of discretion. (i) But no general rule can be laid down on the subject; and as the prisoner may be legally convicted on such evidence, alone and unsupported, the degree of corroboration which the account given by the witness requires is a question exclusively for the jury, from all the circumstances of the case, and especially from the manner in which the child has given its evidence. That evidence may be such as to leave no reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, although it stands unsupported by other witnesses. (k)

Postponement of the trial, where the child was not capable of giving testimony.

Where a criminal prosecution was coming on to be tried, and the learned Judge found that the principal witness was a female infant, wholly incompetent to take an oath, he postponed the trial till the following assizes; and ordered the child to be instructed in the meantime, by a clergyman, in the principles of her duty, and the nature and obligation of an oath. (l) And at the next assizes the prisoner was put upon his trial, and the infant, being found by the Court on examination to have a proper sense of the nature of an oath, was sworn; and the prisoner was convicted upon her testimony, and executed. (m) And where a bill was preferred against a prisoner for carnally knowing a girl under ten years of age, and the girl, being examined by Erle, J., before going before the grand jury, appeared to have no notion of religious or moral duties, and therefore was not sworn, and the bill was ignored in consequence; Erle, J., on the authority of the preceding case, directed the prisoner to be detained till the next assizes, and that the girl in the meantime should be duly instructed. (n) But where it appeared that the material witness, though an adult, and of sufficient intellect, had no idea of a future state of rewards and punishments, and the learned Judge had on that account stopped the case, and discharged the jury, in order that the witness might have an opportunity of being instructed upon that subject, before the next assizes; the Judges were of opinion, that the discharge of the jury was improper, and that an acquittal should have been directed. (o)

But this must not be done in order that an adult may become capable.

Where a child was only six years of age the Judge refused to postpone the trial.

Where it appeared on an indictment for abusing a child under ten years of age that the child was only six years of age, and wholly unacquainted with the nature of an oath, Pollock, C. B., refused to postpone the trial in order that the child might be instructed, observing: 'I think the safety of public justice would be endangered by the postponement of a trial till a child is taught as to the obligation of an oath. More would probably be lost in memory than would be gained in any other way. Still, I can of age had been visited twice by a clergyman, who had given her some instruction as to the nature of an oath; Patteson, J., said, 'I must be satisfied that this child feels the binding obligation of an oath from the general course of her religious education. The effect of the oath upon the conscience of the child should arise from religious feelings of a permanent nature, and not merely from instructions, confined to the nature of an oath, and communicated to her for the purposes of this trial.'

easily conceive that there may be cases where the intellect of the child is much more ripened, as in the cases of children of nine, ten, or twelve years old, for example, where their education has been so utterly neglected that they are wholly ignorant on religious subjects. In those cases a postponement of the trial may be very proper; but where the infirmity arises from no neglect, but from the child being too young to have been taught, I doubt whether the loss in point of memory would not more than countervail the gain in point of religious education. I lay down no general rule, as there may be cases where a postponement would be proper.' (p)

Upon an indictment, the first count of which charged the prisoner with carnally knowing and abusing a girl above ten and under twelve years of age; and the second count with an assault with intent carnally to know and abuse, and the third count with a common assault: the jury negatived the first count, as there was no proof of penetration: it was contended for the prisoner, that supposing the fact to have been done by the consent of the prosecutrix, no conviction could take place on the second and third counts. The jury found that the prosecutrix had consented, and Alderson, B., directed a verdict of guilty, on the ground that the prosecutrix was by law incapable of giving her consent to what would be a misdemeanor by statute; but, upon a case reserved, all the Judges thought that the proper charge was of a misdemeanor in attempting to commit a statutable offence, and that the conviction was wrong. (q) 'The ground on which the Judges went in the preceding case was, that although a child between ten and twelve cannot by law consent to have connection, so as to make that connection no offence, yet, where the essence of the offence charged is an assault (and there can be in law no assault, unless it be against consent), this attempt, though a criminal offence, is not an assault; and the indictment must be for an attempt to commit a felony, if the child is under ten years old, and for an attempt to commit a misdemeanor, if the child is between the ages of ten and twelve; for it is perfectly clear that every attempt (not every intention, but every attempt) to commit a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor.' (r)

Where on an indictment containing a count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and a count for a common assault, the first count was abandoned, there having been so much delay in the disclosure of the transaction that it could not be contended that the child had not consented; but as she was between the ages of ten and twelve, it was proposed to go upon the second count only, as it was a misdemeanor to carnally know and abuse a child between those ages, and an imposition of hands for the purpose of committing that misdemeanor was contended to be an assault; it was held that the prisoner must be acquitted, for to support a charge of assault it must be proved that there was such an assault, as could not be justified if an action were brought, and leave and license pleaded. If a girl under ten years of age consents to illicit intercourse with a man, he is not guilty of an assault.

The prisoners, who were all under fourteen years of age, were indicted for a common assault upon a girl nine years of age. The prisoners and the girl went into a hay-loft, where each of the prisoners had connection with the girl. When the boys first began to take liberties, the girl showed some unwillingness, but eventually she ceased to offer any opposition, and apparently assented. The verdict was 'Guilty, the child being an assenting party, but that from her tender age she did not know what she was about.' And a case was reserved upon the question whether, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the girl, being of the age of nine years only, actually did give, or was competent to give, such assent to the act in question, as to invalidate the conviction of a common assault; and the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was wrong, as it had been solemnly decided (t) that if the girl assents it is not an assault, and here the jury have found that the girl gave her assent. The Judges could not tell whether that were really so or not; but they must take the verdict as they found it. (u)

Where on a trial for carnally knowing a child under ten years of age, the child was too young to be examined, but a surgeon proved marks of violence which might have been inflicted by any foreign substance, and it was submitted that the prisoner might be convicted of an assault, as the consent of the child could not be presumed, by reason of its tender age: Patteson, J., said: 'That is a mistake of the law. My experience has shown me that children of very tender age may have vicious propensities. A child under ten years of age cannot give consent to any criminal intercourse, so as to deprive that intercourse of criminality; but she can give such consent as to render the attempt no assault. We know that a child can consent to that which, without such consent, would constitute an assault.' (v)

As to the difference between consent and submission in children of tender age.

There is a great difference between consent and submission, especially in the case of a girl of tender years, when in the power of a strong man, and mere submission in such a case by no means shows such a consent as will justify in point of law. Upon an indictment for attempting to abuse a child under the age of ten, containing a count for a common assault, no proof was given of the child being under ten years of age, but it appeared that the prisoner made an attempt on her, without any violence on his part, or actual resistance on hers, and it was contended that as she offered no resistance, it must be taken that she consented, and therefore the prisoner must be acquitted. Coleridge, J.: 'There is a difference between consent and submission; every consent involves a submission; but it by no means follows that a mere submission involves consent. It would be too much to say, that an adult submitting quietly to an outrage of this description, was not consenting; on the other hand, the mere submission of a child, when in the power of a strong man, and most probably acted upon by fear, can by no means be taken to be such a consent as will justify the prisoner in point of law. You will therefore say whether the submission of the prosecutrix was voluntary on her part, or the result of fear under the circumstances in which she was placed. If you are of the latter opinion, you will find the prisoner guilty on the second count of the indictment.' (w)

We have seen that where a prisoner is indicted for a misdemeanor, and the evidence proves that he was guilty of a felony, he is not on that account to be acquitted. (x) But where upon an indictment for having carnal knowledge of a girl above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years, it appeared that in fact the girl was under the age of ten years; Maule, J., held that this was not a case falling within the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 12, as that section only applied to cases of merger; e. g. the case of false pretences, where the facts proved that the false pretences had been effected by a forgery. In such a case under this section, a prisoner might, nevertheless, be convicted. But that section only applied to cases where the indictment was proved by facts amounting to a felony. The words in this indictment 'being above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years,' were material, constituting the misdemeanor charged, and they had not been proved. (y)

Conviction of a misdemeanor, though the evidence proves a felony to have been committed.

It had been held before that enactment, that where a prisoner was indicted for carnally knowing a girl between ten and twelve years of age, and it was proved that he had committed a rape upon her, he was not thereby entitled to be acquitted. (z)

Upon an indictment for having carnal knowledge of a girl between ten and twelve years of age, it appeared that in fact she was under ten years of age; and Maule, J., held that the indictment could not be amended under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1, as the words were matter of substance. (a)

R. contained in the first count; but that if the second count had contained the words, 'the said

Of procuring the Defilement of Girls under Age.

Procuring the defilement of a girl under age.

THE 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76, first provided for the offence of procuring the defilement of young women; but that Act is repealed; and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 49, 'whosoever shall by false pretences, false representations, or other fraudulent means, procure any woman or girl under the age of twenty-one years, to have illicit carnal connection with any man, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (d)

On the trial of an indictment under this section, the prisoner may be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence, and punished accordingly. (e)

Since the passing of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76, it has been held that a conspiracy by false pretences to procure a female under the age of twenty-one years to have illicit carnal connection with a man, is an indictable misdemeanor at common law. (f)

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

OF SODOMY.

IN treating of the offence of sodomy, peccatum illud horribile, inter Christianos non nominandum, it is not intended to depart from the reserved and concise mode of statement which has been adopted by other writers.

It appears from different authors, that in ancient times the punishment of this offence was death: (a) but it had ceased to be so highly penal, when the 25 Hen. 8, c. 6, again made it a capital offence. But this Act and the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, are repealed, and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61: 'Whosoever shall be convicted of the abominable crime of buggery, committed either with mankind or with any animal, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than ten years.' (b)

Sodomy and bestiality.

Sec. 62. 'Whosoever shall attempt to commit the said abominable crime, or shall be guilty of any assault with intent to commit the same, or of any indecent assault upon any male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (c)

Attempt to commit an infamous crime.

The offence consists in a carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature by man with man; or in the same unnatural manner with woman; or by man or woman in any manner with beast. (d) With respect to the carnal knowledge necessary to constitute this offence, as it is the same that is required in the case of rape, it will be sufficient to refer to the preceding chapter. (e)

Definition of the offence.

In this offence as well as in rape, it has been held, since the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, that the crime is complete on proof of penetration, and even if emission be expressly negatived. (f)

(a) But the books differ as to the mode of punishment. According to Britton, a sodomite was to be burnt, Britt. lib. 6, c. 9. In Fleta it is said, pecorantes et sodomite in terrâ vivi confodiantur. With this the Mirror agrees; but adds, 'issint que memoire seont restraine, pur le grand abomination del fait;' thereby consigning them, with just indignation, to shameful and eternal oblivion. Mirr. c. 4, s. 14. About the time of Richard the First, the practice was to hang a man, and drown a woman, guilty of this offence. 3 Inst. 58.

(b) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 15, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 18 (I); but the punishment is mitigated. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881.

(c) This clause is new, except the part in common type, which is from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29. As to adlers and abettors in these offences, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. This Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland.

Of aiders, and accessories.

To constitute this offence, the act must be in that part where sodomy is usually committed. The act in a child's mouth does not constitute the offence. (g) An unnatural connection with an animal of the fowl kind is not sodomy, a fowl not coming under the term 'beast;' and it was agreed clearly not to be sodomy, when the fowl was so small that its private parts would not admit those of a man, and were torn away in the attempt. (h)

Those who are present, aiding and abetting in this offence, are all principals; (i) but if the party on whom the offence is committed be within the age of discretion, namely, under fourteen, (k) it is not felony in him, but only in the agent. (l) But where one count charged the prisoner with committing an unnatural crime on J. Wood, and another count charged the prisoner with permitting the said J. Wood to commit an unnatural crime with him, and the facts were that the prisoner induced J. Wood, a boy of twelve years of age, to have carnal knowledge of his person, the prisoner having been the pathic in the crime, and the jury found the prisoner guilty, the Judges, upon a case reserved, were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. (m) There may be accessories before and after in this offence, and the statute provides for such accessories. (n)

Indictment.

The indictment must charge that the offender contra naturam ordinem rem habuit veneream, et carnaliter cognovit. (o) But it is said, that this alone would not be sufficient; and that, as the statute describes the offence by the term 'buggery,' the indictment should also charge peccatumque illud sodomiticum Anglicè dictum buggery attunc et ibidem acquirit, felonice, diaboliçè, ac contra naturam, commisit, ac perpetravit. (p)

Where an indictment alleged that the prisoner did attempt to commit an unnatural crime with 'a certain animal called a bitch;' it was objected that the description was too uncertain, as it might apply to a bitch fox, a bitch otter, or the bitch of some other animal; but Tindal, C. J., held that the description was sufficient. (q)

Evidence.

That which has been before stated with regard to the evidence and manner of proof in cases of rape, ought especially to be observed upon a trial for this still more heinous offence. When strictly and impartially proved, the offence well merits strict and impartial punishment; but it is from its nature so easily charged, and the negative so difficult to be proved, that the accusation ought clearly to be made out. The evidence should be plain and satisfactory, in proportion as the crime is detestable. (r)

first witness being asked why he did not mention the offence until so long a time had elapsed, said he did so, but it was not to a magistrate, and there was no confession, and nothing offered by the counsel for the prosecution to explain the delay; Alderson, B., told the jury, 'I ought not to allow this case to go further. It is monstrous to put a man on his trial after such a lapse of time. How can he account for his conduct so far back? If you accuse a man of a crime the next day, he may be enabled to bring forward his servants and family to say where he was and what he was about at the time; but if the charge be not preferred for a year or more, how can he clear himself? No man's life would be safe if such a prosecution were permitted. It would be very unjust to put him on his trial.'(s)

A party consenting to the commission of an offence of this kind, whether man or woman, is an accomplice, and requires confirmation. On the trial of an indictment for an unnatural offence by a man upon his own wife, she swore that she resisted as much as she could. Patteson, J., said, 'There was a case of this kind which I had the misfortune to try, and it there appeared that the wife consented. If that had been so here the prisoner must have been acquitted; for although consent or non-consent is not material to the offence, yet as the wife, if she consented, would be an accomplice, she would require confirmation; and so it would be with a party consenting to an offence of this kind, whether man or woman.'(t)

Upon an indictment for an unnatural crime, the prisoner may be convicted, under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, of an attempt to commit the same, and thereupon punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for such attempt.(u)

It is not allowable to show, on the trial of an indictment, that the prisoner has a general disposition to commit the same kind of offence as that charged against him; therefore, in a prosecution for an infamous crime, an admission by the prisoner, that he had committed such an offence at another time, and with another person, and that his natural inclination was towards such practices, ought not to be received in evidence.(v)

In cases where it is not probable that all the circumstances necessary to constitute this offence will be proved, it may be advisable only to prefer an indictment for an assault with intent to commit an unnatural crime. And it should be observed, that the mere soliciting another to the commission of this crime has been treated as an indictable offence.(w)

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

OF THE FORCIBLE ABDUCTION AND UNLAWFUL TAKING AWAY OF FEMALES; AND OF CLANDESTINE MARRIAGES.

It appears to be the better opinion, that if a man marry a woman under age, without the consent of her father or guardian, it will not be an indictable offence at common law. (a) But if children be taken from their parents or guardians, or others entrusted with the care of them, by any sinister means, either by violence, deceit, conspiracy, or any corrupt or improper practices, as by intoxication, for the purpose of marrying them, it appears that such criminal means will render the act an offence at common law, though the parties themselves may be consenting to the marriage. (b) And seduction may be attended with such circumstances of combination and conspiracy as to make it an indictable offence. A case is reported where Lord Grey and others were charged, by an information at common law, with conspiring and intending the ruin of the Lady Henrietta Berkeley, then a virgin unmarried, within the age of eighteen years, one of the daughters of the Earl of Berkeley (she being under the custody, &c., of her father), and soliciting her to desert her father, and to commit whoredom and adultery with Lord Grey, who was the husband of another daughter of the Earl of Berkeley, sister of the Lady Henrietta, and to live and cohabit with him; and further, the defendants were charged that, in prosecution of such conspiracy, they took away the Lady Henrietta at night from her father's house and custody, and against his will, and caused her to live and cohabit in divers secret places with Lord Grey, to the ruin of the lady, &c. The defendants were found guilty, though there was no proof of any force; but on the contrary it appeared that the lady, who was herself examined as a witness, was desirous of leaving her father's house, and concurred in all the measures taken for her departure, and subsequent concealment. It was not shown that any artifice was used to prevail on her to leave her father's house; but the case was put upon the ground that there was a solicitation and enticement of her to unlawful lust by Lord Grey, who was the principal person concerned, the others being his servants, or persons acting by his command, and under his control. It was made a question of considerable doubt, whether persons 'receiving wittingly the woman so taken against her will, and

Accessories.

(d) By the first part of this clause, the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 19, is extended to Ireland, and by the second part the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 23 (I.), is extended to England. The words in italics in the first branch of the clause were introduced to avoid a doubt which might have been raised, whether the cases they expressly include were within the former enactments. In the second branch, the age of twenty-one is substituted for eighteen in the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 23 (I.). Under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 23 (I.), the girl must have been married or defiled, and by the person taking her away. The clause is so altered as to make it correspond with the 9 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 19, in both respects. The last part of the clause is framed on the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 23 (I.), and extended to England. It is enlarged so as to embrace property that may come to the woman after the marriage; and the Court of Chancery is empowered to settle the property in such manner as it deems fit, instead of its being vested in trustees for the separate use of the wife alone, which was all that the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 23 (I.), directed. The Court, therefore, may, in its discretion, settle the property on the issue of the marriage, and in default of such issue, on any relatives of the wife. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(e) This clause is new in England, and was taken from the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 22 (I.), and 5 Vict. Sess. 2, c. 28, s. 15 (I.). It provides a very proper protection to women who happen to have neither any present nor future interest in any property. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. knowing the same,' were ousted of clergy by the statute of Elizabeth, when that statute was in existence. (f) But it was agreed that those who received the offender, knowingly, were only accessories after the fact, according to the rule of the common law. (g) With respect to those who were only privy to the marriage, but in no way parties or consenting to the forcible taking away, it was holden that they were not within the statute. (h)

Where the woman had nothing, and was not heir apparent, the case was not within the statute. (i) Thus where a man, worth £5,000, in lands and goods, had a son and daughter, and the daughter was enticed from his house, forced into the country, and there married; a bill being exhibited against the husband for this conduct, it was referred to the Chief Justice and Hobart, whether this was within the statute, and so not examinable in the Star Chamber; and, on conference with all the Judges, they held that it was not within the statute; because the daughter had no substance of her own, and was not heir apparent, and it was only to women having substance of their own, or being heirs apparent, that the statute applied. (k)

of the statute
3 Hen. 7, c. 2.

It was no sort of excuse that the woman was at first taken away with her own consent, if she afterwards refused to continue with the offender, and was forced against her will: for till the time when the force was put upon her, she was in her own power; and she might from that time as properly be said to be taken against her will, as if she had never given any consent. (l) Getting a woman inveigled out by confederates, and then detaining and taking her away, was a taking within the statute. Thus, where a confederate of the prisoner's inveigled a girl of fourteen, having a portion of £5,000, to go with her and a maid servant in a coach into the Park, where the prisoner got into the coach, and the two women got out; and the prisoner detained the girl while the coach took them to his lodgings in the Strand; and the next morning he prevailed upon her (having threatened to carry her beyond sea if she refused) to marry him, and (though he was apprehended on the same day) there was evidence that she was deflowered; the prisoner was convicted and executed. (m) The taking alone did not constitute the offence under the repealed statute, and it was necessary that the woman taken away should have been married or defiled by the misdoer, or by some other, with his consent. Where, therefore, an heiress was fraudulently taken away against her will in England, but the marriage took place in Scotland, an indictment upon the repealed statute could not be supported. (n) But the new enactment makes the taking away or detaining a woman, with intent to marry or carnally know her, a complete offence. And under the 3 Hen. 7, c. 2, it was decided, that if the woman were under force at the time of taking, it was not at all material whether she were ultimately married or defiled with her own consent or not; on the ground that an offender should not be considered as exempted from the provisions of the statute, by having prevailed over the weakness of a woman, whom he got into his power by such base means. (o) And it was also decided that a marriage would be sufficient to constitute the offence, though the woman was in such fear at the time that she knew not what she did. Sarah Cox, an orphan, having £1,300, was forced from her house at Islington into Surrey, and there married. The indictment against the two men who carried her away, and one of whom married her, was in Surrey, and the taking was alleged there. She was examined as a witness, and swore that when she was married she was in such fear that she knew not what she said or did. It was urged, that the taking being in Middlesex, the indictment should not have been in Surrey, no force having been proved there; but the Court said it was a continuing force into Surrey; and therefore a forcible caption there. Then it was said that the marriage was null, because the woman did not know what she said or did; but the Court held, that though this might avoid the marriage, yet it was a marriage de facto, and sufficient within the statute. Further it was urged, that an intent to marry or defile was not alleged in the indictment, but the Court said it was not necessary. (p)

Upon the 3 Hen. 7, c. 2, where a woman was taken away forcibly in one county, and afterwards went voluntarily into another county, and was there married or defiled, with her own consent, it was holden that the fact was not indictable in either county; on the ground that the offence was not complete in either, but that if by her being carried into the second county, or in any other manner, there was a continuing force in that county, the offender might be indicted there, though the marriage or defilement ultimately took place with the woman's own consent. (q) The enactment of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12, would have applied to this objection. (r)

The doctrine that there must have been a continuance of the force into the county where the defilement took place, was recognized and acted upon in the following case, by which a great deal of public interest was excited. The prisoners, Lockhart Gordon, a clergyman, and Loudon Gordon, his brother, were indicted upon the repealed statute, for the forcible abduction of Rachael A. Lee, under the following circumstances. The prosecutrix, Mrs. Lee, a natural daughter of Lord Le De Spencer, and entitled by his Lordship's will to a considerable fortune, married, in the year 1794, and when she was about the age of twenty, a Mr. M. A. Lee, from whom she shortly afterwards separated, and continued to live apart from him, in the receipt of an income of above 900*l.* per annum, secured to her separate use. In the month of December, 1803, when she was living in Bolton Row, Piccadilly, the prisoner, Loudon Gordon, under the care of whose mother she had been placed for some time when a girl, introduced himself to her by means of her medical attendant, as an old acquaintance, and some short time afterwards the other prisoner, Lockhart Gordon, also called upon her; and both of them being recognized by her, they continued, but more especially Loudon Gordon, occasionally to visit her house. Loudon Gordon called four or five times in the month of December, and several times in the following January, previous to the transaction in question. Mrs. Lee stated that their conversations, on these visits, were chiefly upon books, as her habits were studious; but that upon Loudon Gordon taking leave after his first visit he saluted her; and that on his second visit she warned him against entertaining any attachment for her, which she thought a likely thing to happen, as he was a young man; and that upon her giving this caution, he said he had an attachment, and that his happiness was in her hands. By way of changing the conversation, she then read to him an account of a dream which she had had, and requested him to interpret it, which he afterwards did, by sending to her an interpretation, which was clever and ingenious. The third time he called he proposed a tour into Wales, which she did not agree to, either then or at any time; but she admitted that she did not give such an absolute refusal as to prevent his mentioning the subject again, and that in a letter which he wrote to her, about the 12th of January (and which contained strong declarations of attachment), he alluded to the tour; but she expressly stated, that she did not know of any plan for going with him anywhere, nor ever consented to any such plan; though when it was mentioned by him on the same day on which she received his letter, she said, 'We will talk of it.' A letter from Lockhart Gordon was received by her, together with that from Loudon, in which he also mentioned the proposed tour as likely to conduce to her happiness; described himself as having a head to conceive, a heart to feel, and a hand to execute, whatever might be for her advantage; and declared that if his brother ever deceived her he would blow his brains out. A short time before Sunday, the 15th of January, Mrs. Lee invited Loudon Gordon to dine with her on that day, and requested that he would bring his brother Lockhart with him; and they came accordingly. This was the time at which the offence was alleged to have been committed. According to Mrs. Lee's account of the material transactions at that time, it appeared that after dinner she said to Lockhart Gordon, 'What do you think of the extraordinary plan your brother has proposed?' To which he replied, 'If he loves you, and you love him, I think it will tend to your mutual happiness; you will gain two friends.' That she did not recollect anything more being said upon the subject till Lockhart Gordon pulled out his watch, said it was near seven o'clock, and that the chaise would soon be there; and said, further, 'You must go with Loudon to-night.' She thought this a joke, as no mention had been previously made of leaving London, or of any chaise; and she knew of no preparations having been made for her leaving London. About this time, Loudon Gordon came towards Mrs. Lee with a ring, and attempted to put it on her finger; but she drew away her hand, and the ring was left upon the table. She then attempted to go upstairs, but Lockhart Gordon said she should not, and placed himself against the door; and either at that time, or soon afterwards, he produced a pistol; she, however, after having rung the bell violently, got out at the door, and went upstairs, where she said to her female servant, 'There is a plan to take me out of my house; they are armed with pistols; say no more, but watch.' She described herself as having felt quite panic-struck at that time. Soon afterwards the prisoners came upstairs, and Lockhart Gordon said, 'I am determined you shall go:' this was not said in a threatening manner; but soon afterwards, upon her saying to him, 'What right have you to force me out of my house?' he said, 'I am desperate,' and looked as if he was so. Mrs. Lee described herself as then getting into a very wretched and confused state of mind, not absolutely stupid, but unable to recollect what passed. But it appeared from the evidence of her servants, that Loudon Gordon first came down stairs, and sent the footman to call a coach, who went accordingly; and that the only servants then in the house were two females; that Loudon returned upstairs, when a scuffle was heard almost immediately, and Mrs. Lee called out, 'I am determined not to go out of my own house;' to which Lockhart Gordon replied, 'I am desperate, Mrs. Lee.' The female servants went immediately upstairs, and found Lockhart pushing Mrs. Lee out of the drawing-room, with his arm round her waist, and Loudon near them. Mrs. Lee was in a thin muslin dress, with a small crape handkerchief about her head, as she was dressed for dinner, and without any hat or bonnet. One of the servants put her arms round Mrs. Lee's waist, to drag her away, but Lockhart Gordon produced a pistol, and swore that he would shoot the servant, by which she was so much alarmed, that she desisted. The other servant then took Mrs. Lee by the hand, but quitted it upon Lockhart Gordon's threatening also to shoot her, and presenting a pistol. Lockhart Gordon then laid hold of one of the servants, and, both of them being so much alarmed as to make no further resistance, Loudon Gordon put his arm round Mrs. Lee's waist, and took her down stairs, and out at the street door; when Lockhart Gordon immediately followed. It appeared by other witnesses that a post-chaise, which the prisoners had ordered in the course of the morning, was at that time waiting at the end of Bolton Row; that Mrs. Lee was taken to it by Loudon Gordon; that Lockhart Gordon followed; and that it drove off immediately on the road to Uxbridge. Mrs. Lee's account was, that though she remembered but imperfectly what took place at the time she was taken away, she was certain that she went from the house against her will, but that no manual force was used to get her into the chaise. She described herself in a state of partial stupefaction; and several of the witnesses spoke of her as being of a very nervous frame, easily agitated, and subject to depression of spirits, to such an extent as to be occasionally in a state of great mental misery.

As soon as Mrs. Lee and the two prisoners had got into the chaise, it drove off at a smart pace towards Uxbridge, Mrs. Lee sitting in the middle between the prisoners; and it appeared that, after changing horses at Uxbridge and at Wycombe, the party arrived at Tetsworth, about twelve miles from Oxford, between one and two o'clock in the morning. Mrs. Lee stated, that she frequently remonstrated with the prisoners in the course of the journey; and particularly told Lockhart Gordon that it was 'a most infernal measure, and a breach of hospitality;' and repeatedly asked him for a chaise to take her back to London; making the application principally to him, because he seemed to have taken the lead in the whole business. But it appeared, as well from her own admissions as from the evidence of the post-boys, that she never called for assistance at the inns, turnpike gates, or other places; and one of the post-boys stated, that, at Wycombe, one of the prisoners asked her, whether she would stay there or go on to Tetsworth or Oxford, and that her answer was, 'I don't care.' Mrs. Lee also admitted, that a ring was put upon her finger in the course of the journey by Loudon Gordon; and that, during the journey, but whether before they got to Uxbridge or afterwards she could not tell, she took a steel necklace, with a camphire bag attached to it, from her neck, and threw it out of the window of the chaise, saying, 'That was my charm against pleasure; I have now no occasion for it.' She said, that she used the word 'charm,' as alluding to the supposed medical property of camphire in quieting the nerves, and calming the passions, particularly the passion which a person of one sex feels for a person of the other; and that she was in the habit of wearing it as a sedative; that at the time she used the expression she gave herself up, but that she afterwards expostulated. And she also admitted, that during the journey she made some inquiries concerning Loudon Gordon's health; and might, perhaps, have inquired how long it was since he had been acquainted with a person of her own sex.

At Tetsworth the parties got out of the chaise, and supper and beds were ordered to be prepared. Mrs. Lee stated, that she ate a good supper, and that there was a good deal of cheerful conversation during the repast; the whole of which she did not recollect, but that part of it related, as she believed, to Egyptian hieroglyphics and architecture. A question was then put to her, whether the whole of what passed might not have induced Loudon Gordon to have believed that he might approach her bed; to which she answered, 'It might; I was in desperation.' She admitted, that she might have told Loudon Gordon to see that the sheets were well aired; but said that if she had had the perfect exercise of her judgment, and her mind had been free from force, she should have been more inclined to have ordered a chaise than to have gone to bed. After she had gone up stairs into the bed-room, the chambermaid asked her, when she should be in bed, and when the gentleman should come up; to which she replied, 'In ten minutes.' Upon this statement of Mrs. Lee's, in her examination, the following question was put to her, 'What induced you to send such a message?' and it was objected to by the counsel for the prisoners, on the ground that it was not a question as to a fact, but to something existing in the mind of the witness. Lawrence, J., overruled the objection; but said, that whether the answer would be evidence or not must depend upon the nature of it; that if Mrs. Lee should answer, 'I thought my life in danger; for Lockhart Gordon told me, if I did not let Loudon Gordon come to bed to me, he would blow my brains out:' such answer would certainly be evidence, though the apprehensions of the witness, unsupported by words used by the prisoners, or facts, would not. The question was then put: and Mrs. Lee answered, 'I was under the impression that my life was in danger from Lockhart Gordon: and I was apprehensive of some serious scuffle at the inn, in which lives might be lost.' Mrs. Lee then stated, that shortly after the chambermaid left the room, Loudon Gordon came to bed to her, and remained with her all the night; and that the intercourse took place between them which usually takes place between husband and wife.

These were the material facts of the case, with the addition, that it was proved by the woman with whom the prisoners lodged in London, that, previous to the time when this transaction took place, Lockhart Gordon was pressed for money, and backward in his payments, and that Loudon Gordon had admitted to her that he was in distressed circumstances. The learned counsel for the prisoners was proceeding in his cross-examination of Mrs. Lee, to question her as to her religious principles; and she had just admitted, that she seldom went to any place of worship, and was inclined to doubt the Christian religion, when Lawrence, J., after having inquired of the counsel for the prosecution, whether they had any further evidence to offer of force in the county of Oxford, and been told by them that they had not, said, that he was of opinion the case should not proceed any farther. The learned Judge then addressed himself to the jury, and told them, that, in order to constitute the offence with which the prisoners were charged, there must be a forcible taking, and a continuance of that force into the county where the defilement takes place, and where the indictment is preferred; that in the present case, though there appeared clearly to have been force used for the purpose of taking the prosecutrix from her house, yet, it appeared also, that in the course of the journey she consented, as she did not ask for assistance at the inns, turnpike gates, &c., where she had opportunities; and that, as she was unable to fix times or places with any precision, this consent probably took place before the parties came into the county of Oxford; and that they must therefore acquit the prisoners. (s)

Upon an indictment for abduction on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 19, it must have been proved that the prisoner took away the woman from motives of lucre, but his expressions relative to her property were evidence that he was actuated by such motives. Upon an indictment for having feloniously and from motives of lucre taken away and detained M. E. against her will, she having a future interest in certain personal property, containing a count with intent to marry, and a count with intent to defile, it appeared that the prisoner had taught M. E. music, and had paid his addresses to her, which were favourably received by her, but which her relatives insisted upon her breaking off, and by their advice she wrote to the prisoner to tell him that the intimacy must cease for ever. One day when she was walking out the prisoner came in a gig, got out, came behind her, and having placed his hand on her shoulder carried her in his arms to the gig, she struggling and screaming all the time he was doing so. He then drove away with her, but was pursued and overtaken at a distance. She was cross-examined with a view to show that she had consented to the abduction. M. E. would, on her attaining the age of twenty-one, be entitled to the sum of 2,100*l.*, and the prisoner had said that he knew she would be entitled to 200*l.* a year. It was contended that if the prisoner carried her off even against her own consent to make her his wife from affection to her person, and not as the means of getting at her property, the offence was not proved. In Rex v. Wakefield, (t) the parties had no previous intimacy, and therefore all inducement to the act arising from real passion and affection was out of the question; and the abduction in that instance, as well as in almost every other which had been the subject of penal inquiry, could be accounted for on no other grounds than those of cold and sordid calculation, to get possession of a lady's property by first obtaining possession of her person. Parke, B., 'I agree with the learned counsel for the prisoner, that there is a great distinction between this case and the case of Rex v. Wakefield, as there was not in that case any previous intimacy between the parties. I also agree with him as to his argument, that if all the other requisites of the statute constituting the offence are satisfied, and the evidence of the motive being the base and sordid one of lucre is unsatisfactory or insufficient, it will be your duty to acquit the prisoner of the charge of felony. It is clearly made out that Miss Ellis is entitled to personal property, and that the prisoner took her away with the intention of marrying her; and I think that the other count may be entirely laid out of your consideration, as there is no evidence of it whatever. You will therefore say, whether the prosecutrix being a lady entitled to property, the prisoner either took her away or detained her against her will, with the intent of marrying her, but for the base purpose of getting possession of her property; and if you come to the conclusion that that was so, it will be your duty to find him guilty of the felony. With respect to the motives of the prisoner, evidence has been given of expressions used by the prisoner respecting the property of Miss Ellis, such as his having told one of the witnesses that he had seen Mr. Whitwell's will, and that she would be entitled to 200*l.* a year. These expressions are important for you to consider, in order to your forming a judgment whether the prisoner was actuated by motives of lucre or not. Unless you are satisfied that such a motive prompted him to take away the prosecutrix against her will, he is entitled to be acquitted of the felony.' (u)

Necessary

It was resolved, that an indictment for this offence upon the repealed statute, ought expressly to set forth that the woman taken away had lands or goods, or was heir apparent, and that the taking was against her will; and that it was for lucre; and also that she was married or defiled; such statement being necessary to bring a case within the preamble of that statute, to which the enacting clause clearly referred in speaking of persons taking away a woman 'so against her will.' (w) But it was said not to have been necessary to state in the indictment, that the taking was with an intention to marry or defile the party, because the words of the statute did not require such an intention, nor did the want of it in any way lessen the injury. (x) In an indictment, however, upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, the allegation as to the intent will be necessary.

It appears to have been considered as clear, that a woman taken away and married might be a witness against the offender, if the force were continuing upon her till the marriage; and that she might herself prove such continuing force; (y) for though the offender was her husband de facto, he was no husband de jure, in case the marriage was actually against her will. (z) It seems, however, to have been questioned how far the evidence of the inveigled woman would be allowed, in cases where the actual marriage was good, by her consent having been obtained after forcible abduction. (a) But other authorities appear to agree that it should be admitted, even in that case; esteeming it absurd that the offender should thus take advantage of his own wrong, and that the very act of marriage, which was a principal ingredient of his crime, should (by a forced construction of law) be made use of to stop the mouth of the most material witness against him. (b) And where the marriage was against the will of the woman at the time, there does not seem to be any good ground upon which her competency could be objected to, though she might have given her subsequent assent. (c) It also appears to have been ruled upon debate, in one case, that a wife was a competent witness for as well as against her husband, on the trial of an indictment for this offence, although she had cohabited with him from the day of her marriage. Upon an indictment for conspiring to commit a violation of the 3 Hen. 7, c. 2, and 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8 (now repealed), it was proposed to call her as a witness for the prosecution, and she was objected to, on the ground that the marriage was valid, and consequently she was incompetent. Unlawful abduction of a girl from her parents or guardians.

Abduction of a girl under sixteen years of age.

The unlawful abduction of a girl under the age of sixteen from her parents, or persons having the charge of her, is an offence of the degree of misdemeanor. By the 24 & 25 Viet. c. 100, s. 55, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (h)

The construction upon some parts of the repealed statutes, 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, may still be worthy of observation.

It was decided, that the taking away a natural daughter under sixteen years of age, from the care and custody of her putative father, was an offence within the 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8. (i) It was also holden that a mother retained her authority, notwithstanding her marriage to a second husband; and that the assent of the second husband was not material. (h) In the last case it was also ruled, that the fourth section of the statute extended only to the custody of the father, or to that of the mother where the father had not disposed of the custody of the child to others. (l) In a case where a widow, fearing that her daughter, who was a rich heiress, might be seduced into an improvident marriage, placed her under the care of a female friend, who sent

(e) It was contended that her incompetency might be shown either by examining her on the voir dire, or by other witnesses, and for the defendant it was proposed to show her incompetency by other witnesses. Hullock, B. ruled that as this was a point of practice, and he saw some inconvenience in not calling her, which would not exist if she were called, she should be called.

for her son from abroad, and married him openly in the church, and during canonical hours, to the heiress, before she attained the age of sixteen, and without the consent of her mother, who was her guardian; it was holden, that in order to bring the offence within the statute, it must appear that some artifice was used: that the elopement was secret: and that the marriage was to the disparagement of the family. (m) But on this case it has been remarked, that no stress appears to have been laid upon the circumstance of the mother having placed the child under the care of the friend, by whose procuration the marriage was effected; and that it deserves good consideration before it is decided that an offender, acting in collusion with one who has the temporary custody of another's child, for a special purpose, and knowing that the parent or guardian did not consent, was not within the statute; for that then every schoolmistress might dispose, in the same manner, of the children committed to her care. (n) It has been said that there must be a continued refusal of the parent or guardian; and that if they once agree it is an assent within the statute, notwithstanding any subsequent dissent; (o) but this was not the point in judgment; and it has been observed that it wants further confirmation. (p)

It seems that it was no legal excuse for this offence that the defendant, being related to the lady's father, and frequently invited to the house, made use of no other seduction than the common blandishments of a lover, to induce the lady secretly to elope and marry him, if it appeared that the father intended to marry her to another person, and so that the taking was against his consent. (q)

And the prohibition being general, the want of a corrupt motive was no answer to the criminal charge. (r) It seems that if an indictment or information upon this statute stated, that the defendant, 'being above the age of fourteen years, took one A., then being a virgin unmarried, possessed of moveable goods, and seised of lands of great value, out of the custody of her mother, &c.,' the word being was a sufficient averment of the facts which follow. (s)

On an indictment for the abduction of a girl under sixteen years of age, it appeared that the prisoner pretended that he had heard of a place for the girl; the mother said that the child was too young, being only between ten and eleven years of age; but the prisoner said she was quite old enough, for he only wanted her to go to Southampton with a lady who was ill, to nurse a baby which she had, and to go on errands. The prisoner called the same day and took the child away, saying the lady was too ill to come herself. He did not, however, take her to any lady, but kept her with him from Monday to Friday, and slept with her every night, and then took her home. The father proved that he parted with the child on the representation that she was to go to live with a lady, which he believed to be true. On the part of the crown, it was urged that the consent of the father having been obtained by the fraudulent representations of the prisoner, was no consent at all; for the prisoner, it was urged that the abduction was not complete, for the child was brought back; if this were an abduction, any seducing away of a girl for an hour would be an abduction; there was no intention shown to deprive the parents of the child. Gurney, B., left it to the jury to say whether the father was induced to part with the possession of the child by the fraudulent representations made by the prisoner. (t)

of a girl.

Where, on the trial of a similar indictment, it appeared that the girl was in service and had been sent by her mistress to the work-house for bread, and as she was coming back she saw the prisoner, whom she had known before, as they had been to school together, and she asked her if she would go to London with her, the prisoner stating that her (the prisoner's) mother wanted a servant, and would give her (the girl) 5*l.* wages; there was a little boy; she said, I, and the boy, and herself were to go under the name of Davis, and to pass for brother and sisters. She took a piece off the loaf. I went with her to Bilston because she cut the loaf, and I dared not go home, and she afterwards accompanied the prisoner towards London; it was urged that as the child was induced to go with the prisoner by the false representation that the prisoner's mother would employ her as a servant, this was a constructive taking within the Act. Parke, B.: 'It is quite evident that the Legislature made a distinction between an offence under sec. 20 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, and under sec. 21; (u) and I am inclined to think, that to bring a case within sec. 20, there must be an actual taking or causing to be taken away; and a mere decoying or enticement away, which would be an offence within sec. 21, would not constitute one under sec. 20.' But where, on a similar indictment, it appeared that a girl between fifteen and sixteen years of age, residing in her father's house, went to the window of a loft, to which she had access from her bedroom window, and there found a ladder reared up against the window, and went down the ladder, which the prisoner held for her to descend, and which she expected to find at the window, as she had previously arranged with the prisoner to bring the ladder and to clope with him, but he had never proposed it to her; she went away with the prisoner, who was eighteen years old, and cohabited with him for three weeks: it was submitted that there was no taking or causing to be taken within the meaning of the Act, and the previous case was relied on; Atcherley,

The mother proved that she would have let the child go with the prisoner if he had told her that she was to go and live with him as his servant; but Gurney, B., held that this could not affect the case.

(u) Secs. 55 and 56 of the new Act correspond with secs. 20 and 21 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, see p. 950 and p. 966.

(v) Reg. v. Meadows, 1 C. & K. 399, Spr. Ass. 1844. Coleridge, J., agreed with Parke, B. in this decision. It is to be observed that in this case the girl was out at service; but there was a count alleging the taking away to be from her mistress. The statement of this case is framed from the report in C. & K., and the note of Parke, B., Dears. C. C. 161 (a).

Serjt., 'It is said here that there was no taking, because the girl was willing to go; to support that view of the case it must be contended that there never can be a taking within this enactment where the girl is a consenting party. But it appears to me that if a man takes a girl under sixteen from her father's house, under the circumstances that have been proved here, that is an unlawful taking within the meaning of this Act.' It was then contended that the prisoner probably did not know that the girl was under sixteen years, as her appearance led to the supposition that she was older; but Atcherley, Serjt., told the jury, 'With respect to the prisoner not knowing that the girl was under sixteen, I hold that the case is within the Act if the girl was, in fact, not sixteen years of age, and that a person taking her away does so at his peril. By her appearance and her forwardness—for she made the proposal to elope—the prisoner might have taken her for more than sixteen, but that is no ground of defence, however it may be matter of mitigation. My opinion is, that if this girl was under sixteen years of age, and the prisoner knew her to be under the care of her father, and made a bargain with her to take her away, and did so, this is a case within the Act.' (w)

Where, on a similar indictment, it was proved that the prisoner was in the service of the prosecutor, and that having had connection with his daughter, a girl under sixteen, she became in the family way, and told the prisoner of it, saying that she was ashamed to face her father any more, and that it was her intention to leave her home; the prisoner said, if she quitted the house he would do the same, and it was thereupon agreed between them that they should go together; and they accordingly both quitted the house, the girl taking nothing with her except her clothes: it was objected that there was no such taking away by the prisoner as to bring the case within the Act; for the girl was the moving party, and the prisoner only assented to her proposal. Alderson, B.: 'I am of opinion that the case is within the Act, and that the prisoner has been guilty of the offence of taking this girl from the possession of her father, even though the proposal for their flight may have emanated from, and been suggested to him by, the girl. Under these circumstances, I think the requisites of the section have been complied with. Whenever a man and a girl, within the statutable age, go away together from the house and possession of the father of the girl, I am of opinion that there is a taking away of the girl on the part of the man, no matter whether the proposal to leave the house emanated from the man or the girl in the first instance.' (x)

Where on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl was between fifteen and sixteen years of age, and the prisoner had for several months corresponded with her, and paid her the attentions of a lover, though he was a married man, and had endeavoured to persuade her to leave her home, where she was living with her parents, and ultimately prevailed upon her to meet him at a place in the village where they were both living, which accordingly she did, when they left the village together. There was no suggestion of any force or fraud used by the prisoner in inducing the girl to consent to elope with him. It was urged that there was no taking within the meaning of the Act, as the girl went voluntarily with the prisoner, and Reg. v. Meadows (y) was relied upon; for the crown, Reg. v. Robins and Reg. v. Biswell (z) were cited. Maule, J.: 'If the construction apparently put upon the statute in Reg. v. Meadows be the right construction, the Act can hardly ever be violated, except in the case of children in arms. It rarely or never happens that the abductor takes away a girl of fourteen or fifteen in his arms, or upon his back; so that such an interpretation would make the statute inoperative. The law throws a protection about young persons of the sex and within the age specified by the statute. It has been determined by the Legislature, that at that age young females are not able to protect themselves, or give any binding consent to a matter of this description. It is therefore quite immaterial whether the girl abducted consent or not; if her family, that is to say, those who under the statute may lawfully have the possession and control over her, do not consent to her departure, the offence is completed.' (a)

The taking need not be by force, actual or constructive. It is immaterial whether the girl consents or not. If the girl be a member of the family and under the father's control, that is sufficient.

Upon a similar indictment, it appeared that the prisoner had stated to the father that he intended to emigrate to America, and a short time before his departure he had privately persuaded the girl, who was between twelve and thirteen, to go with him to America, and on the morning of his departure he had secretly told her to put her things in a bundle, and to walk to a place where he would meet her; she did so, and the prisoner, having parted with her father in a road, met her at the place appointed, and they travelled together to London, where he was apprehended, and then said he had paid the girl's passage to London, and was going to take her to America. For the prisoner it was urged that as the girl went voluntarily there was no taking within the meaning of the statute, and Reg. v. Meadows was cited. (b) Reg. v. Robins (c) was cited on the other side, and it was stated that Maule, J., at a previous assize, had declined to act on Reg. v. Meadows. Coleridge, J., overruled the objection, and told the jury that the girl was in the father's possession while in his house, although he was not actually in it; that the taking need not be by force, nor against the girl's will; and that if the prisoner by persuasion induced her to leave her father's roof against his will, in order to her going with him to America, the case was within the statute; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. In a case like the present the taking need not be by force, actual or constructive, and it is immaterial whether or not the girl consents. The Act was passed to protect parents and others having the lawful charge or custody, and it is therefore immaterial whether the taking be with or without the consent of the girl. And as to the taking of the girl out of the possession of the father, a manual possession is not necessary; if the girl be a member of the family, and under the father's control, there is a sufficient possession. If a girl leaves her father's house for a particular purpose, with his sanction, she cannot legally be said to be out of his possession. Here the father had possession until the very act of taking, (d)

Where on a similar indictment against a man and a woman, it appeared that the girl had become acquainted with the female prisoner, and at her house met the male prisoner, and she and the prisoners met frequently, and at last she left her father's house, as she said, to go for a walk, at the same time saying that she should return in an hour, but she did not return; and the same evening her brother went to the house of the female prisoner, who denied having seen her; and it was afterwards discovered that she had left the same night, and she was afterwards found in a low lodging together with the male prisoner; the girl had taken some wearing apparel to the house of the female prisoner the day before she left home, and she had advised her to go away with the male prisoner; it was contended that there was nothing to show that the girl's going away was not entirely voluntary. Wightman, J., told the jury, that 'this offence is complete under the statute which creates it without any reference to the object for which the girl may be taken. You must be satisfied that the girl was under sixteen years of age, and that her father was unwilling that she should go away, and it must be assumed to be so, if it appears that, had he been asked, he would have refused his consent. You must also be satisfied that the prisoners, or one of them, took the girl out of the possession of her father. For this purpose a taking by force is not necessary; it is sufficient if such moral force was used as to create a willingness on the girl's part to leave her father's house. If, however, the going away was entirely voluntary on the part of the girl, the prisoners would not be guilty of any offence under this statute.' (e)

Where on a similar indictment the prisoner was proved to have lodged in the house of the girl's father, and he and the girl became engaged, and he induced her to go with him to a Roman Catholic chapel, where they were married; but she immediately returned to her father's house, and continued to live there as before; and the marriage had never been consummated; the father did not know of the marriage till two or three weeks afterwards; it was urged that the girl had never been taken out of her father's possession within the meaning of the Act; it was answered that the marriage without the father's consent was an abduction within the meaning of the Act, and after the marriage the father had no legal control

Effect of marriage.

(d) Reg. v. Mankletow, Dears. C. C. 159, Spr. Ass. 1853. Supposing the girl to have abandoned her father's possession, and the prisoner then to take her away, it would not come within the statute. But supposing she conditionally abandoned the possession of her father under the impression that the prisoner would be at a certain point to take her away, that would not be a determination of the father's possession. Per Parke, B. ibid. On Reg. v. Meadows being cited, Jervis, C. J., observed that 'the girl, by voluntarily going from her father's house, may have severed the possession of the father, and so could not be said to be taken out of the possession of her father. I do not find that in Reg. v. Kipps that point was brought before my brother Maule's mind;' and at the end of his judgment he added, 'I do not think the case of Reg. v. Kipps interferes at all with the decision in Reg. v. Meadows.' over the girl. It was held that the case was within the Act; the girl could not be considered to be in the father's possession, although she was in his house; because she was in the lawful possession of her husband, and the father never could have the custody of her in the same sense as before her marriage. The distance she was taken, and the time she was kept away, were immaterial, her husband having power to take her away whenever he liked, and her whole relationship to her father being altered by the marriage. Timmins' case.

Deception or forwardness of the girl is no answer.
What is a sufficient taking from the possession of the father.
The taking may be for a time only.

Where on a similar indictment it appeared that the prisoner was well known to the girl, and she had on a former occasion slept with him a whole night; and that he asked her if she would mind going out with him on the Sunday, and she answered 'no;' and on the Sunday, in fulfilment of the engagement, she went and met the prisoner, and they went to London together, and spent three days in visiting places of public entertainment, sleeping together at night, and on Wednesday morning, on getting up, the prisoner said to her, 'I'll go to work, and you go home:' they separated, and the girl went home; the father swore that his daughter was absent without his knowledge and against his will. The jury found that the father did not consent, and that the prisoner knew he did not consent, and that the prisoner took the girl away with him in order to gratify his passions, and then allow her to return home, but not with a view of keeping her away permanently; and, upon a case reserved upon the question, whether, on the facts so found, any offence had been committed under the statute, Erle, C. J., delivered judgment: 'We are of opinion that the conviction must be affirmed. The statute was passed for the protection of parents, and for preventing unmarried girls from being taken out of the possession of their parents against their will; and it is clear that no deception or forwardness on the part of the girl in such cases can prevent the person taking her away from being guilty of the offence created by this section. The difficulty which we have is to say what constitutes a taking out of the possession of the father. The taking away might be consistent with the possession of the father, if the girl went away with the party intending to return in a short time; but when a person takes a girl away from the possession of her father, and keeps her away against his will for a length of time, as in this case, keeping her away from her home for three nights, and cohabiting with her during that time, we think the evidence justified the jury in finding the taking to be a taking out of the possession of the father within the meaning of the statute. The prisoner took the girl away from under her father's roof, and placed her in a situation quite inconsistent with the father's possession. In our judgment, therefore, the jury were justified in their verdict by the evidence before them, which we consider to be the point submitted to us, although the prisoner did not intend the taking to be permanent, but when his lust was gratified intended to cast the girl from him. We limit our judgment to the facts of this particular case. It may be that a state of facts might arise upon which the offence would be complete in law when the girl passed her father's threshold.

(f) Reg. v. Baillie, 8 Cox C. C. 238. Jul. 1859. The Common Serjeant and Recorder.

as where she is taken away with the intention of keeping her away permanently; but we mean it to be understood, that, although we affirm this conviction, we do not intend to say that a person would be liable to conviction under the section if it should appear that the taking was intended to be temporary only, or for a purpose not inconsistent with the relation of father and child. It is sufficient for us to say that in this case the conviction was justified by the evidence.' (g)

Where on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl was the younger sister of the prisoner's deceased wife, and had lived in his house up to the time of his wife's death, but on that occasion another married sister had caused her to be placed under the care of another woman, and no improper motive was alleged against the prisoner, he having alleged as his reason for taking the child away that he had promised her father on his death-bed to take care of her; Cockburn, C. J., told the jury that it was clear that the prisoner had no right to take the child out of the woman's custody. But as no improper motive was suggested, it might be concluded that the prisoner wished the child to live with him, and that he meant to discharge the promise he had made to her father, and that he did not suppose he was breaking the law when he took the child away. If the jury should take this view of the case, and be of opinion that the prisoner honestly believed that he had a right to the custody of the child, then, although the prisoner was not legally justified, he would be entitled to be acquitted. (h)

Taking without any improper motive.

Where on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl was more than fifteen, but in appearance three years older and very prepossessing, and lived with her mother, a widow; on the evening of the alleged abduction she left her mother's house at nine o'clock to spend the night at a married sister's, but, joining company with another girl, they went to a public-house and met the two prisoners, and from thence went to another public-house, where they met the prisoners again by appointment, and thence to the farming premises of one of the prisoners, where they remained till four o'clock in the morning; it was then proposed that they all should go to London, which they did, and stayed the day there, and one of the prisoners slept with the girl and the other with her companion, and returned the next day. The mother swore that it was not by her consent that the girl had gone away, and that she had inquired everywhere for her without success; but the girl stated that she occasionally went to dances at public-houses, and was occasionally out late at night without anyone to look after her, and that her mother on these occasions left the door on the latch, or came down and let her in; that the prisoner who slept with her was not the first man who had had connection with her. Cockburn, C. J., directed the jury that there was no case against the other prisoner; and as to this prisoner, if they thought that the mother had by her conduct countenanced the daughter in a lax course of life, by permitting her to go out alone at night and to dance at public-houses, this was not a case that came within the intent of the statute; but

Where a parent countenances the loose conduct of the girl, the jury may infer that the taking is not against the parent's will.

was one where what had occurred, though unknown to her, could not be said to have happened against her will. (i) Frazer's case.

Neglect of the parent.

On a similar indictment it appeared that the prisoners persuaded the girl and another, above the age of sixteen, to meet them at the railway station, and accompany them to London, where they stayed a few days, and then returned, the girl going back to her father's house; she accompanied the men very readily, and had been in the habit of staying out late at night, and her conduct was generally bad; it did not appear that the father had taken such care of her as might have been expected. It was contended that, the words of the Act being 'unlawfully take,' some taking must have been intended which was unlawful before the Act passed; something in the nature of a trespass must have been intended; and further, that a mere temporary absence was not sufficient. Pollock, C. B., held, that it was not necessary to prove such a taking as was suggested, and that the taking proved was sufficient to satisfy the statute, and that the second objection was answered by Reg. v. Timmins: (k) but he had considerable doubt whether the statute was intended to apply to a case where so much profligacy on both sides was shown. 'A father is bound to take reasonable care of his child, and this man's conduct in regard to the management of his daughter caused a doubt whether she really was taken away against the will of her father. (l)

the streets.

Where on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl, who was fourteen years old, lived with her father, but the prisoners saw her in the streets by herself, and invited her to go with them, giving her drink to induce her, which made her dizzy and sick; and they took her to a lonely house, and there one of them had criminal intercourse with her, keeping her there all night; and the next morning the child was found there crying; Martin, B., said: 'There must be a taking out of the possession of the father. Here the prisoners picked up the girl in the streets, and, for anything that appeared, they might not have known that the girl had a father. The essence of the offence was taking the girl out of the possession of the father. The girl was not taken out of the possession of anyone.' (m)

The parent is entitled to the custody of his child up to sixteen.

It is clearly settled that a father is entitled to the custody of his child until it attains the age of sixteen, unless there be some sufficient reason to the contrary. Writs of habeas corpus had issued to J. Howse and R. Hopkins to bring up the body of a young lady, aged fifteen years; she left her father's house, and Howse alleged that, at the request of the girl's stepmother, he took charge of her, and kept her at his house for some days; that the girl left his house to go to the house of her aunt, and that he had since learned that she had left her aunt's by direction of her stepmother, to go to the house of her stepmother's sister; and it was held that the father was entitled to the custody of the child, she being fifteen years of age, when that child, without any adequate or justifying cause, desired to withdraw herself from his parental care and control. The Court must lay down a general rule as to the age when the minor might be left to freedom of choice. The Legislature had thrown light on this subject, by which the Court might safely be guided. The age of sixteen had been pointed out as the age up to which the consent of a female child should not justify her withdrawal from the father's roof without its being considered a misdemeanor. The Court might, therefore, safely act upon the rule, that the age of sixteen is that up to which a female child ought to be subject to parental control. If the persons, who in this case had done their best to baffle the exertions of this Court, had been indicted under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 20, no one could doubt that they would have been liable to be convicted of the offence. The Court ordered the girl to be restored to her father. (n)

Many of the provisions of the Marriage Act, 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, have been already stated. (o) The twenty-first section enacts, 'That if any person shall, after the first day of November, 1823, solemnize matrimony in any other place than a church or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, or at any other time than between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon, unless by special license from the Archbishop of Canterbury: or shall solemnize matrimony without due publication of banns, unless license of marriage be first had and obtained from some person or persons having authority to grant the same: or if any person falsely pretending to be in holy orders, shall solemnize matrimony according to the rites of the Church of England, every person knowingly and wilfully so offending, and being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be deemed and adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be transported (p) for the space of fourteen (q) years, according to the laws in force for transportation of felons, provided that all prosecutions for such felony shall be commenced within the space of three years after the offence committed.' By the 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 3, 'Every superintendent registrar, who shall knowingly and wilfully issue any license for marriage after the expiration of three calendar months after the notice shall have been entered by the superintendent registrar, as provided by the said Act for marriages, (w) or who shall knowingly and wilfully solemnize, or permit to be solemnized in his office any marriage in the last recited Act declared to be null and void, shall be guilty of felony.' The 12 Geo. 3, c. 11, confirms the prerogative of the crown to superintend and approve of the marriages of the royal family. (y) The first section enacts, 'That no descendant of the body of King George the Second, male or female (other than the issue of princesses who may have married, or may hereafter marry, into foreign families), shall be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of his Majesty, his heirs, or successors, signified under the great seal, and declared in council (which consent, to preserve the memory thereof, is hereby directed to be set out in the license and register of marriage, and to be entered in the books of the privy council); and that every marriage or matrimonial contract of any such descendant, without such consent first had and obtained, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.' (z) Provision is then made for a marriage, without the royal consent, of any such descendant, being above twenty-five years of age, after notice to the privy council, and the expiration of twelve months after such notice; in case the two Houses of Parliament do not before that time expressly declare their disapprobation of the marriage. (a) The third section of the statute enacts, 'That every person who shall knowingly or wilfully presume to solemnize, or to assist, or to be present at the celebration of any marriage, with any such descendant, or at his or her making any matrimonial contract, without such consent as aforesaid first had and obtained, except in the case above-mentioned, shall, being duly convicted thereof, incur and suffer the pains and penalties, ordained and provided by the statute of provision and præmunire made in the sixteenth year of the reign of Richard the Second.'

Upon the trial of any offence mentioned in this chapter the defendant may, under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, be convicted of an attempt to commit the same, and thereupon may be punished as if he had been convicted on an indictment for such attempt. (b)

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

OF KIDNAPPING, AND CHILD-STEALING.

SEC. I.

Of Kidnapping.

[716] THE stealing and carrying away, or secreting of any person, sometimes called kidnapping, is an offence, at common law, punishable by fine and imprisonment. (a)

Carrying away or secreting any person. Forcible abduction of persons, and sending them into other countries.

The forcible abduction or stealing and carrying away of any person, by sending him from his own country into some other, or to parts beyond the seas, whereby he is deprived of the friendly assistance of the laws to redeem him from such his captivity, is properly called kidnapping, and is an offence of a very aggravated description. Its punishment at common law is, however, no more than fine and imprisonment; though, as has been remarked concerning it, the offence is of such primary magnitude that it might well have been substituted upon the roll of capital crimes, in the place of many others, which are there to be found. (b)

31 Car. 2, c. 2, s. 12. The sending persons prisoners out of England, &c. made punishable by disability to hold office, and by the pains of præmunire, &c.

The 31 Car. 2, c. 2 (the celebrated Habeas Corpus Act), makes provision against any inhabitant of Great Britain being sent prisoner to foreign countries. The twelfth section enacts, that no subject of this realm, being an inhabitant or resiant of England, Wales, or the Town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, shall be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, Tangier, or into parts, garrisons, islands, or places beyond the seas, within or without the dominions of his Majesty. Such imprisonment is then declared to be illegal; and an action for false imprisonment is given to the party, with treble costs, and damages not less than five hundred pounds. The section then proceeds thus:—‘ And the person or persons who shall knowingly frame, contrive, write, seal or countersign, any warrant for such commitment, detainer, or transportation, or shall so commit, detain, imprison, or transport, any person or persons, contrary to this Act, or be any ways advising, aiding, or assisting therein,’ being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be disabled from thenceforth to bear any office of trust or profit within England, &c., or the dominions thereunto belonging, and shall incur the pains, &c. of the statute of præmunire, 16 R. 2, and shall be incapable of any pardon from the King of such forfeitures or disabilities. There are some exceptions in the Act relating to the transportation of felons: and the sixteenth section provides, that offenders may be sent to be tried where their offences were committed, and where they ought to be tried. The seventeenth section enacts, that prosecutions for offences against the Act must be within two years after the offence committed, if the party grieved be not then in prison; and if he be in prison, then within two years after his decease, or delivery out of prison, which shall first happen.

By the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 206, 'If the master or any other person belonging to any British ship, wrongfully forces on shore and leaves behind, or otherwise willfully and wrongfully leaves behind, in any place, on shore or at sea, in or out of Her Majesty's dominions, any seaman or apprentice belonging to such ship before the completion of the voyage for which such person was engaged or the return of the ship to the United Kingdom, he shall for each such offence be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.'

Forcing seamen on shore a misdemeanor.

Sec. 207. 'If the master of any British ship does any of the following things; (that is to say)

- (1.) Discharges any seaman or apprentice in any place situate in any British possession abroad (except the possession in which he was shipped), without previously obtaining the sanction in writing indorsed on the agreement of some public shipping master or other officer duly appointed by the local government in that behalf, or (in the absence of any such functionary) of the chief officer of customs resident at or near the place where the discharge takes place;
- (2.) Discharges any seaman or apprentice at any place out of Her Majesty's dominions without previously obtaining the sanction so indorsed as aforesaid of the British consular officer there, or (in his absence) of two respectable merchants resident there;
- (3.) Leaves behind any seaman or apprentice at any place situate in any British possession abroad on any ground whatever, without previously obtaining a certificate in writing so indorsed as aforesaid from such officer or person as aforesaid, stating the fact and the cause thereof, whether such cause be unfitness or inability to proceed to sea, or desertion or disappearance;
- (4.) Leaves behind any seaman or apprentice at any place out of Her Majesty's dominions, on shore or at sea, on any ground whatever, without previously obtaining the certificate indorsed in manner and to the effect last aforesaid of the British consular officer there, or (in his absence) of two respectable merchants, if there is any such at or near the place where the ship then is:

No seamen to be discharged or left abroad without certificate of some functionary.

He shall for each such default be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and the said functionaries shall and the said merchants may examine into the grounds of such proposed discharge, or into the allegation of such unfitness, inability, desertion, or disappearance as aforesaid, in a summary way, and may for that purpose, if they think fit so to do, administer oaths, and may either grant or refuse such sanction or certificate as appears to them to be just.'

Proof of such certificate to be upon the master.

Sec. 208. 'Upon the trial of any information, indictment, or other proceeding against any person for discharging or leaving behind any seaman or apprentice, contrary to the provisions of this Act, it shall be upon such person either to produce the sanction or certificate hereby required, or to prove that he had obtained the same previously to having discharged or left behind such seaman or apprentice, or that it was impracticable for him to obtain such sanction or certificate.'

Sec. 518. In all places, except Scotland, the offences are to be punished as follows:—1. 'Every offence by this Act declared to be a misdemeanor, shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment.' (c) 2. 'Every offence by this Act declared to be a misdemeanor, shall also be deemed to be an offence hereby made punishable by imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months with or without hard labour, or by a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and may be prosecuted accordingly in a summary manner instead of being prosecuted as a misdemeanor.' (d)

Offence where deemed to have been committed.

Sec. 520. 'For the purpose of giving jurisdiction under this Act, every offence shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the offender or person complained against may be.' (e)

Form of a certificate under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19.

Where on an indictment on the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, against a master of a vessel for leaving one of his crew at Quebec, in Lower Canada, for the defence a certificate stating that the defendant appeared before E. B. a commissioner for carrying into effect the imperial Act of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, respecting merchant seamen, and being duly sworn, said that the seaman in question did desert from the vessel while at Quebec, and was then absent without leave, it was held that this certificate was insufficient. It did not state the facts as ascertained by the proper authority, but merely proved that the captain swore certain things before him. The Act required the proper officer to certify that the truth is so, not that another deposed to it. (f)

On an indictment for leaving a seaman behind, the ownership of the vessel must be proved. The only defence under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, was a certificate under that Act, or proof that one could not be obtained.

The indictment alleged that the defendant was master of a merchant ship called the Sarah Charlotte, belonging to a subject of the United Kingdom, namely, J. H., and that E. W. and H. G. were persons belonging to the crew, and on board the said ship, duly engaged to serve in a voyage, which was not then completed; and that one E. P. was Her Majesty's consul at Bahia, and that the defendant at Bahia unlawfully, wilfully, and wrongfully did leave the said E. W. and H. G. behind on shore, before the completion of their voyage, on the plea that they were not in a condition to proceed on the voyage, he not having obtained a previous certificate in writing of the said consul or of any such functionary of their not being in such condition, there being time to obtain

(c) The Court is also empowered to grant costs in the same manner as if the misdemeanor had been mentioned in the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64.

(d) 3. The offences just mentioned may be prosecuted before two justices in England under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and in Ireland under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93.

(e) The Act contains other provisions for service of summons, levying and application of penalties, limitation of summary proceedings, and for legal proceedings in Scotland.

(f) Reg. v. Smison, 1 Cox C. C. 188. Commr. Bullock after consulting the Recorder.

such certificate. (g) It appeared from the evidence for the prosecution, that E. W. and H. G. were both ill when the vessel put into Bahia on her voyage, and went ashore, and saw the doctor, who said they were not sick enough to be left on shore, and go to the hospital, as they wished; they then went to the English consul, who said he could do nothing without the doctor's certificate, and the captain then said they might take his boat and fetch their things ashore, and keep out of the consul's sight till the ship had sailed. They did so, and the captain sent them some dollars by a passenger. For the defence it was shown that E. W. and H. G. asked the captain's leave to go ashore to see the doctor or consul, as they did not wish to stay in the ship, not being able to do their duty, and that the captain said he could not put them on shore till he had seen the consul; that they went ashore, and came again and asked for their clothes, and the mate believing that they had got their discharge, though they did not say so, let them have them; that they were very ill, and if they had not gone on shore at Bahia and got medical advice, one of them would have died; that the consul refused them a certificate, and the passenger, thinking it was a cruel refusal on his part, gave them the dollars out of his own pocket, to relieve them on shore, and did not pay them as the agent of the captain. The collector of customs of the port of Harwich produced a certificate of the registry of the ship with the name James Howard in it, which he knew to be his signature, but did not see him write it: the declaration was signed by him. He knew Howard personally. He lived near Harwich, and was the proprietor of several ships. He did not know where he was born: he was a British subject; he knew he was so by the declaration which he had made. He believed him to be an Englishman. Cresswell, J., and Coleridge, J., were of opinion, first, that the allegation of ownership was a material allegation, and must be proved as laid; secondly, that the 41st (h) and 42nd sections of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, did not create separate offences, but that they should be taken together, and were intended to show that certain conduct on the part of the seaman will not excuse the captain, unless he produce the required certificate; and therefore, thirdly, that on this indictment, which charged the defendant with wrongfully and wilfully leaving behind him two persons belonging to his crew, the only answer he could give would be either to prove the certificate, or show the impossibility of obtaining it; and not having done either of these things, if the jury believed the evidence, he must be found guilty. (i) (g) The count concluded with an averment that the defendant was found within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court.

SEC. II.

Of Child Stealing.

[718] Child stealing. BY the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully, either by force or fraud, lead or take away, or decoy or entice away or detain, any child under the age of fourteen years, with intent to deprive any parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful care or charge of such child, of the possession of such child, or with intent to steal any article upon or about the person of such child, to whomsoever such article may belong, and whosoever shall, with any such intent, receive or harbour any such child, knowing the same to have been, by force or fraud, led, taken, decoyed, enticed away, or detained as in this section before mentioned, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping: provided that no person who shall have claimed any right to the possession of such child, or shall be the mother or shall have claimed to be the father of an illegitimate child, shall be liable to be prosecuted by virtue hereof on account of the getting possession of such child, or taking such child out of the possession of any person having the lawful charge thereof.' (k)

Whipping. By sec. 70, 'Whenever whipping may be awarded for any offence under this Act, the Court may sentence the offender to be once privately whipped, and the number of the strokes and the instrument with which they shall be inflicted shall be specified by the Court in the sentence.' (l)

Conviction of an attempt. Upon the trial of any offence contained in the preceding section, the defendant may, under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, be convicted of an attempt to commit the same, and thereupon may be punished as if he had been convicted on an indictment for such attempt. (m)

(k) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 21, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 25 (1). The word 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'maliciously,' which was inaccurately used in the former enactments. The age of the child is extended from ten to fourteen years, and 'guardian' is introduced; and in the proviso words are added to include the mother of an illegitimate child. As to counsellors and aiders, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900.

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

OF CONSPIRACIES AND ATTEMPTS TO MURDER; OF MAYHEM, OR MAIMING; AND OF DOING OR ATTEMPTING SOME GREAT BODILY HARM.

SEC. I.

Of Conspiracies to Murder.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, 'All persons who shall conspire, confederate, and agree to murder any person, whether he be a subject of Her Majesty or not, and whether he be within the Queen's dominions or not, and whosoever shall solicit, encourage, persuade, or endeavour to persuade, or shall propose to any person, to murder any other person, whether he be a subject of Her Majesty or not, and whether he be within the Queen's dominions or not, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not more than ten and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. (a)

Conspiring or
commit murder.

This clause is new in England, but in Ireland, under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, ss. 8, 9, the offences mentioned in it were capital felonies; and in the Bill, as it passed the House of Lords, the offences were continued as felonies, but liable to penal servitude for life; the House of Commons, however, altered them to misdemeanors, punishable with ten years' penal servitude, and as all the offences specified in this clause appear to be misdemeanors at common law, (b) the effect of this clause is merely to alter the punishment of them.

Conspiracies to murder have very rarely come before any tribunal in England: but there is one very notorious case, where a number of persons, in order to procure the rewards given by Acts of Parliament for apprehending robbers on the highway, concocted a pretended charge of robbery against one Kidden, who was convicted and executed for it upon the evidence of two of them, and these persons were afterwards tried for his murder and convicted, but not punished under this indictment; (c) but they were convicted on an indictment for a conspiracy, and sentenced to be set in the pillory twice, imprisoned for seven years, and, until they found sureties for their good behaviour for three years afterwards. (d)

(a) The Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900. As to offences on the sea, see ante, p. 762.

(b) Rex v. Higgins, 2 East, R. 5.

(c) See ante, p. 687.

(d) Rex v. Macdaniel, Forst. 121. It is not clear whether the indictment was for a conspiracy to murder Kidden, or

The words 'whether he be a subject of Her Majesty or not, and whether he be within the Queen's dominions or not,' were introduced in order to make it perfectly clear that this clause included a case where the conspiracy was to murder a foreigner in a foreign country. The words were introduced ex abundanti cautela only, and this clause must never be cited as any legislative declaration that a conspiracy in England to murder a foreigner in a foreign country is not a conspiracy indictable at common law, or that the killing of a foreigner in a foreign country, under such circumstances as would amount to murder if the killing were in England, is not murder in contemplation of the law of England. (e)

There is no doubt that it is not essential that the conspiracy should have been formed in England or Ireland. The Act, by sec. 68, includes conspiracies on the sea; and even if that section did not exist, British subjects who conspire on the high seas are triable by the common law in any county in England where any act in furtherance of such conspiracy is done by any one of them, or by their innocent agent; for the crime of conspiracy, amounting only to a misdemeanor, may, like high treason, be tried wherever one distinct overt act of conspiracy is in fact committed. Where the only acts personally done by the defendants were done either on the high seas at Brassa Sound, or in the Isle of Shetland, and the only acts done in Middlesex, where they were indicted, were done by innocent agents in furtherance of the conspiracy of the defendants, it was held that they were properly tried in Middlesex. (f) So where the individual actings of some of the conspirators were wholly confined to other counties than Middlesex, but the conspiracy against all was proved from the community of criminal purpose, and by their joint co-operation in forwarding the objects of it in different counties, the locality required for the purpose of trial was held to be satisfied by overt acts done by some of them in prosecution of the conspiracy in Middlesex, where the trial was had. (g) Now, at common law, the criminal jurisdiction of counties was local. They were like another person, or to pervert the course of justice.

(e) The introduction of the words in question makes it unnecessary to discuss either of those questions; but, having with no small care examined all the authorities to be found on the subject, I may be pardoned for saying that it is perfectly clear to me that the killing of any person anywhere in the world, whether on land or sea, under such circumstances that if the killing had been in England it would have amounted to the crime of murder, has ever been murder in contemplation of the law of England. Wherever a murder has taken place in England or on the narrow seas, the Court of King's Bench, or Courts of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery, have had jurisdiction to try it by a jury. Wherever a murder has taken place on the high seas, the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction to try it according to the civil law; and wherever a murder has taken place on land abroad, the Court of the Constable and Marshal had jurisdiction to try it according to the civil law. By sundry statutes in and since the time of Hen. 8, the jurisdiction to try murders committed on the high seas and on land abroad, has been conferred on certain tribunals with the aid of a jury; but none of these statutes either alters, or professes to alter, the nature of the offence; on the contrary, they all treat it as murder, and only provide a different mode of trial. The doubt which has arisen, and not unnaturally, seems to have sprung from supposing that, because the Common Law Courts, trying all offences by the aid of a jury, had only jurisdiction over offences committed in England or on the narrow seas, therefore murder and other offences against the law of nature and nations were no offences at all in the eye of the law of England. The answer is, that the Courts of Admiralty and of the Constable and Marshal did try such offences from the earliest times; and, therefore, it is clear that they always were offences in the eye of the law of England.

(f) Rex v. Brisac, 4 East, R. 163.

(g) Rex v. Bowes, cited in Rex v. Brisac, supra.

different kingdoms; (h) yet in conspiracy the jury could, as we have seen, at common law take cognizance of acts done on the high seas or in another county, provided there were an overt act done in the county where the indictment was preferred: and it would therefore seem that if there were a conspiracy on land abroad, a jury might try it in any place in England where any overt act in pursuance of it was done. Lastly, suppose A. in England conspired with B. abroad to commit a murder, and A. did some overt act in England, it would seem that both A. and B. might be tried in England, if B. was a British subject; and that if B. was not a British subject, A. might, nevertheless, be tried where he did that overt act; for such an act would be an act coupled with a criminal intent, and as such indictable, within the principle laid down in Rex v. Higgins, (i) even if it should be objected that a conspiracy between A. in England and B., a foreigner, abroad, was not a conspiracy within the criminal law of England. And as a letter written and sent, but intercepted, is an overt act in treason; (k) so a letter may be an overt act in conspiracy. In consequence of some doubts that have been uttered, it may be well to add that every foreigner, except an ambassador, whilst in England, is quite as much amenable to our criminal law as a native subject. By the 32 Hen. 8, c. 16, s. 9, every alien, who shall come into this realm, 'shall be bounden by and unto the laws and statutes of this realm, and to all and singular the contents of the same:' (l) and where a statute speaks of the King's subjects, it extends to aliens; for though they are not the King's natural-born subjects, they are the king's subjects when in England by local allegiance. (m)

If a question should be raised whether, if one of the conspirators were to commit the murder, and the others were indicted as accessories before the fact, it might not be objected that they could only be tried for a misdemeanor under this clause; the answers are, first, that this clause has only altered the punishment, and created no new offence; and at common law the power to prosecute for a misdemeanor was not only never suggested as in any way preventing a prosecution for felony, but the best authorities always held that the misdemeanor merged in the felony. But, secondly, nothing can be clearer than that if a statute create a misdemeanor, and something be done in pursuance of, and in addition to, that misdemeanor, which amounts to a felony, all persons who have done acts which would make them accessories before the fact to that felony, may be indicted as such (putting aside merger altogether), on the plain ground that they are totally different offences. It has never been suggested, that because wounding with intent to murder is made a felony, therefore a man who killed another by wounding him could not be indicted for murder. There is no such thing as merger of one felony by another; and when, as is often the case, the same acts constitute several felonies, either at common law or by statute, the prosecutor may indict for any of them. Thus, in cases of real murder, indictments for manslaughter have often been preferred, and so also indictments for administering poison where death has ensued.

Soliciting to murder.

Upon an indictment for soliciting A. B. to murder C. D., the evidence was that the prisoner gave poison to A. B. to administer to C. D., and which A. B. accordingly did; but C. D. having taken part of it, discovered the fact in time to save his life; the jury found him guilty, believing that the poison had been delivered to C. D. with intent to poison him, and that the solicitation was to that effect: the Judges held both indictment and conviction proper, in treating the prisoner as a principal soliciting, and not as an accessory before the fact. (n)

Where on an indictment against three prisoners and others unknown, for a conspiracy to murder, one of them was tried first, because they severed in their challenges, and the evidence tended to affect him and the others named in the indictment, and made a case to go to the jury as to a conspiracy by the three: but there was no evidence to show that any other person was engaged in the conspiracy: and the jury found the prisoner guilty, and on his being brought up for judgment it was objected that the prisoner ought not by law to have been tried alone: the Court overruled the objection, and passed sentence on the prisoner: and, upon a case reserved, it was contended that the judgment was irregular: for if the others were acquitted, the prisoner could not be guilty of conspiracy: that there was a contradiction on the face of the record, for the others had not been found guilty, and until they were his guilt was not proved: and that the judgment ought to have been respited. But it was held that there were no grounds on which the judgment should be respited or arrested. (o)

SEC. II.

Of Attempts to Murder; of Mayhem or Maiming; and of doing or attempting some great bodily harm.

[719]
Offences at common law.

ATTEMPTS to commit murder appear to have been considered as felonies in the earlier ages of our law; but that doctrine did not long prevail; and such attempts became, and still remain, at common law, punishable only as high misdemeanors. (p) Where (n) Reg. v. Murphy, Jebb C. & P. C. 315. Hayes' Dig. 631.

(o) Reg. v. Alearne, 6 Cox C. C. 6. Rex v. Cooke, 5 B. & C. 538, was much relied upon in this case; see my note, 2 vol. [691] on that case. It has always appeared to me perfectly clear that even if on a subsequent trial the others were acquitted, it would in no way affect the previous verdict or judgment. The jury who convict a prisoner who is tried alone for conspiracy, must have been satisfied both that he conspired with the other, and that the other conspired with him, and the subsequent acquittal is in no respect necessarily inconsistent with that verdict; for it may have proceeded on the want or failure of evidence. Suppose a defendant pleaded guilty, or was convicted on his own written confession, it might well be that the person with whom he had admitted he had conspired might be acquitted, and it would be absurd that he should thereby be exonerated. It is a fallacy to suppose that there is any inconsistency on the face of a record in such a case; there never is any inconsistency on the face of a record containing an indictment, verdict, and judgment, where any state of facts can be suggested which is consistent with the statements in that record.

(p) Staund. 17. 1 East, P. C. c. 8, s. 5, p. 411. Rex v. Bacon, 1 Lev. 146. 1 Sid. 230, where the defendant, having been convicted for lying in wait to kill Sir Harbottle Grimstone, the Master of the Rolls, was sentenced to fine and imprisonment, the finding surety for his good behaviour for life, and acknowledging an indictment is preferred for an assault with an intent to murder, it seems that the attempt as laid must be fully established, in order to support the indictment: thus, where a defendant was so charged in the first count of the indictment, Lord Kenyon, C. J., being of opinion, upon the facts given in evidence, that if death had ensued it would only have been manslaughter, directed the jury to acquit the defendant upon that count. (g)

Mayhem, or the maiming of persons, was probably at one time an offence at common law of the degree of felony; as the judgment was membrum pro membro. (r) But this judgment afterwards went out of use; partly because the law of retaliation is at best an inadequate rule of punishment; and partly because, upon a repetition of the offence, the punishment could not be repeated. (s) The offence, therefore, appears to have been considered, in latter times, as in the nature of an aggravated trespass; and the only judgment which now remains for it at common law is fine and imprisonment. (t) It is, however, a misdemeanor of the highest kind, and spoken of by Lord Coke as the greatest offence under felony. (u)

A bodily hurt whereby a man is rendered less able in fighting, to defend himself or to annoy his adversary, is properly a maim at common law. (v) Therefore the cutting off, or disabling, or weakening a man's hand or finger, or striking out his eyes or foretooth, or depriving him of those parts, the loss of which, in all animals, abates their courage, are held to be maims; but the cutting off his ear, or nose, or the like, are not held to be maims at common law; because they do not weaken a man, but only disfigure him. (w) In order to found an indictment of mayhem the act must be done maliciously, though it matters not how sudden the occasion. (x)

It is laid down that, by the common law, if a person maim himself in order to have a more specious pretence for asking charity, or to prevent his being impressed as a sailor, or enlisted as a soldier, he may be indicted; and, on conviction, fined and imprisoned. (y) For as the life and members of every subject are under the safeguard and protection of the King; so they are said to be in manu regis, to the end that they may serve the King and country when occasion shall require. (z)

in mayhem.

It should seem that there can be no accessories before the fact in mayhem, at common law; though there appears to have been some difference of opinion, or rather misapprehension, upon the subject. (a) For, supposing the offence to be in the nature of an aggravated trespass only, the rule will apply, that in crimes under the degree of felony there can be no accessories, but that all persons concerned therein, if guilty at all, are principals. (b) It does not appear to have been anywhere supposed, that there can be accessories after the fact in mayhem. (c) statute.

Attempts to murder, maiming, and the doing or attempting great bodily harm, were made highly penal by the enactments of several statutes now repealed. The 9 Geo. 1, c. 22, commonly called the Black Act, and which made the maliciously shooting at any person a capital offence, and the 26 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 1, relating to the beating or wounding persons shipwrecked with intent to kill them, &c., or putting out false lights to bring a ship into danger, were repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 27. The 5 Hen. 4, c. 5, relating to cutting tongues and putting out eyes; the 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 1, called the Coventry Act, by which malicious maiming was made a capital offence; the 9 Anne, c. 16, which made it capital to attempt to kill, assault, wound, &c., a privy counsellor, and the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, commonly called Lord Ellenborough's Act, were repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, which, as well as the 1 Vict. c. 85, is now repealed.

murder.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 11, 'Whosoever shall administer to or cause to be administered to or to be taken by any person any poison or other destructive thing, or shall by any means whatsoever wound or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person, with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (d)

(a) Lord Hale states that there are no accessories before in mayhem, but that they are in the same degree as principals, 1 Hale, 613. Hawkins, on the contrary, says, that it seems there may be accessories before the fact in mayhem. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 29, s. 5. In 1 East, P. C. c. 7, s. 7, p. 401, there is a learned argument, to show that the latter opinion proceeded on a mistake.

(d) This clause is framed from the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2. As the general term 'wound' includes every 'stab' and 'cut,' as well as other wounds, that general term has alone been used in these Acts. All, therefore, that it is now necessary to allege in the indictment is, that the prisoner did wound the prosecutor; and that allegation will be proved by any wound, whether it be a stab, cut, or other wound. Under the 1 Vict. c. 85, it was held that a wound must be inflicted by some instrument in order to come within that statute. The terms by 'any means whatsoever' in that Act applied only to causing bodily harm; by this clause they are applied to wounding, in order to render it immaterial by what means the wound is inflicted, provided it be inflicted with the intent alleged. Rex v. Harris, 7 C. & P. 446; Rex v. Stevens, R. & M. C. C. 409; Jennings' case, 2 Lew. 130; and Rex v. Murrow, R. & M. C. C. 456; and other similar cases cannot therefore be considered as authorities under the present clause. The words 'any grievous bodily harm' are inserted instead of 'any bodily injury dangerous to life,' in order to render the clause more comprehensive. If in any case it be doubtful whether the facts bring it within this clause, but there is evidence that the acts were done with intent to murder, a count on sec. 15, post, p. 973, alleging an attempt to murder, should be added. As to the introduction of the words, 'cause

Sec. 12. 'Whosoever, by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance, shall destroy or damage any building with intent to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years — or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (e)

Destroying or damaging a building with gunpowder, with intent to murder.

Sec. 13. 'Whosoever shall set fire to any ship or vessel, or any part thereof, or any part of the tackle, apparel, or furniture thereof, or any goods or chattels being therein, or shall cast away or destroy any ship or vessel, with intent in any of such cases to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, — or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (f)

Setting fire to or casting away a ship with intent to murder.

Sec. 14. 'Whosoever shall attempt to administer to or shall attempt to cause to be administered to or to be taken by any person any poison, or other destructive thing, or shall shoot at any person, or shall, by drawing a trigger, or in any other manner attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person, or shall attempt to drown, suffocate, or strangle any person, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to commit murder, shall, whether any bodily injury be effected or not, be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years — or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (g)

Attempting to administer poison, or shooting or attempting to shoot, or attempting to drown, &c., with intent to murder.

Sec. 15. 'Whosoever shall, by any means other than those specified in any of the preceding sections of this Act, attempt to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall to be administered to,' see note to s. 14, infra. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900. The Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland.

(e) This clause is taken from the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, s. 2. In this and the next section, the words 'unlawfully and maliciously' are omitted as unnecessary, and 'intent to commit murder' substituted for 'intent to murder any person.' As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(f) This clause is taken from the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 89, s. 4. The words in italics were introduced for the same reason as it was made felony to set fire to goods, &c. in buildings. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(g) This clause is taken from the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3. Where the prisoner delivered poison to a guilty agent, with directions to him to cause it to be administered to another in the absence of the prisoner, it was held that the prisoner was not guilty of an attempt to administer poison within the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3; Reg. v. Williams, 1 Den. C. C. 39, post, p. 989; and the words 'attempt to cause to be administered to or to be taken by,' were introduced in this section to meet such cases. The words 'whether any bodily injury be effected or not,' are substituted for, 'although no bodily injury be effected,' in order to prevent an objection which might possibly have been raised on an indictment under the former clause, if it had appeared that any bodily injury had been effected. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

Sending letters threatening to murder.

Sec. 16. ‘Whosoever shall maliciously send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to kill or murder any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years and not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement, and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping.’ (i)

Impeding a person endeavouring to save himself from shipwreck.

Sec. 17. ‘Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or impede any person, being on board of or having quitted any ship or vessel which shall be in distress, or wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, in his endeavour to save his life, or shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or impede any person in his endeavour to save the life of any such person as in this section first aforesaid, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.’ (k)

Shooting or attempting to shoot, or wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm.

Sec. 18. ‘Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever wound or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person, or shoot at any person, or, by drawing a trigger or in any other manner, attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to maim, disfigure, or disable any person, or to do some other grievous bodily harm to any person, or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any

(h) This section is entirely new, and contains one of the most important amendments in these Acts. It includes every attempt to murder not specified in any preceding section. It will therefore embrace all those atrocious cases where the ropes, chains, or machinery used in lowering miners into mines have been injured with intent that they may break and precipitate the miners to the bottom of the pit. So also all cases where steam engines are injured, set on work, stopped, or anything put into them, in order to kill any person, will fall within it. So also cases of sending or placing infernal machines with intent to murder. See Rex v. Mountford, R. & M. C. C. 441, 7 C. & P. 242, post, p. 979. Indeed every attempt to murder, which perverted ingenuity may devise, or fiendish malignity suggest, will fall within some clause of this Act, and may be visited with penal servitude for life. In any case where there may be a doubt whether the attempt falls within the terms of any of the preceding sections, a count framed on this clause should be added. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(i) The observations and cases bearing on this clause will be found in the Chapter ‘Of Threats and Threatening Letters.’

(k) This clause is taken from the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 89, s. 7. The words ‘unlawfully and maliciously’ are substituted for ‘by force’ in the former Act. Under the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 89, s. 7, if A. were pulling B. out of the water, and C. prevented A. from doing so, C. would have been guilty of no offence, except an assault; the words in italics were introduced to meet this and similar cases. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

Sec. 19. 'Any gun, pistol, or other arms which shall be loaded in the barrel with gunpowder or any other explosive substance, and ball, shot, slug, or other destructive material, shall be deemed to be loaded arms within the meaning of this Act, although the attempt to discharge the same may fail from want of proper priming or from any other cause.' (m)

What shall constitute loaded arms.

Sec. 20. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (n)

Inflicting bodily injury, with or without weapon.

Sec. 23. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, so as thereby to endanger the life of such person, or so as thereby to inflict upon such person any grievous bodily harm, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years and not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (o)

Maliciously administering poison, &c., so as to endanger life, or inflict grievous bodily harm.

Sec. 24. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (p)

Maliciously administering poison, &c., with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy any other person.

(l) This clause is taken from the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 4. The words in italics at the beginning of this section were introduced to make it correspond with s. 11, ante, p. 972. As to the word 'wound,' see the note to that section. The word 'any' is substituted in two places for 'such,' in order to provide for cases where the prisoner wounds, &c. A., when he intends to wound B., and the like. As to principals in the second degree and accessories, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(m) This clause is new, and is introduced to meet every case where a prisoner attempts to discharge a gun, &c. loaded in the barrel, but which misses fire for want of priming, or of a copper cap, or from any like cause. See post, p. 978.

(n) This clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 4; and see the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 29 (I.). The word 'wound' has been so placed in this clause that the words 'either with or without any weapon or instrument,' may apply to it. As to counsellors and aiders, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(p) This clause is taken from the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 8, s. 2. As to counsellors and aiders, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, sureties, &c., see ante, p. 900. Upon an indictment on the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 8, s. 2, for administering cantharides to a female, with intent to injure, aggrieve, and annoy her, it appeared that the prisoner, unknown to the prosecutrix, put cantharides into a cup of tea which she drank, and was very ill in consequence, and the jury found that the prisoner administered the cantharides with intent to excite the sexual passion and desire of the prosecutrix, in order that he

Sec. 25. 'If, upon the trial of any person for any felony in the last but one preceding section mentioned, the jury shall not be satisfied that such person is guilty thereof, but shall be satisfied that he is guilty of any misdemeanor in the last preceding section mentioned, then and in every such case the jury may acquit the accused of such felony, and find him guilty of such misdemeanor, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if convicted upon an indictment for such misdemeanor.' (q)

The following cases, which were decided upon the former statutes, may be here mentioned.—It was said, that upon an indictment on the 9 Geo. 1, c. 22, it was necessary to show that the instrument was loaded with gunpowder, and also with a bullet, slug, or other deadly substance; but that it was sufficient if such facts appeared from the general circumstances of the case. (r) Where it did not appear whether the wounds which the prosecutor had received in his neck and chin were given by the wadding, or by a ball from a pistol, except that the prisoner, who was endeavouring to effect an escape at the time, exclaimed with an oath, 'Let me pass, or I will blow your brains out,' and immediately fired, and the prosecutor said, that he apprehended the wounds must have been given by a ball from the sensation he felt at the time, and because it took him in one place; and another witness said that the report was very strong for so small a pistol; it was contended that there was not sufficient evidence that the pistol was loaded with a leaden bullet. But the Court thought that there was sufficient evidence of that fact to go to the jury: and the jury found the prisoner guilty. (s) It was necessary also, under the same Act, that the shooting should be with an instrument levelled at the party. So that where the prosecutor, who was landlord of the premises occupied by the prisoner, had come in the night to bring provisions for a man whom he had put into possession of the prisoner's goods under a distress for rent, and had got over the pales of the garden for that purpose, but, upon being met by the prisoner and severely beaten, was making his retreat, in the dark, over another part of the pales, more than five yards distance from the place at which he entered, when the prisoner levelled a gun at the place where the prosecutor got into the garden, and immediately fired it off; the gun being thus fired in a different direction from that in which the prosecutor was going, the Court held that it was not a shooting at the prosecutor within the meaning of the statute. (t)

Shooting was within the 43 Geo. 3, though the instrument was loaded with powder and paper only, if it was fired so near the person, and in such a direction, as to be likely to kill, &c. In a case where the prisoner was indicted for shooting at the prosecutor with a loaded pistol, and Le Blanc, J., had told the jury, that if it was loaded with powder and paper only, but fired so near, and in such a direction, that it would probably kill or do other grievous bodily harm, and with intent that it should do so, the case was within the Act; and the jury had convicted, saying, they were satisfied that the pistol was loaded with some other destructive material besides powder and paper; there was a petition to the Crown, on the ground that the pistol was loaded with powder and paper only: and the opinion of the Judges being asked, whether, if that were so, the direction was right, they held that it was. (u)

If all the counts of an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11, for shooting at a person with intent to murder, alleged that the pistol was loaded with powder and a leaden bullet, it must have been proved that the pistol was loaded with a bullet. Upon an indictment against a man as principal in the first degree, for shooting at a woman with intent to murder her, and against her as principal in the second degree, in which all the counts alleged that the pistol was loaded with powder and a leaden bullet, it appeared that a person being awakened by the report of fire-arms in the room where the prisoners were, went into the room, and discovered both prisoners lying on the floor bleeding: on their being asked what was the matter, and who fired, the man said, 'I fired one pistol at her, and the other at myself.' He afterwards said, 'he could feel the ball somewhere in his cheek.' The woman had said she wished the man to shoot her. A surgeon proved that both prisoners were bleeding from the ear, the bones of which were shattered; but no bullet could be found internally or externally, either in the man or the woman, and he thought the wound was either from a ball or the wadding of a pistol, and that wadding, if rammed down tight, might have produced the effect without any ball; search was made in the room, but no ball found. Bolland, B., having consulted Park, J. A. J., and Parke, J., who were present, said to the jury: 'The offence is charged in every count of the indictment as having been committed with a pistol, loaded with a leaden bullet. If the question had arisen with respect to the pistol fired by the man at himself, I should have felt it my duty to leave it to you, on his declaration that he thought he felt a ball in his cheek; but he might have intended to kill himself, being weary of life, though he might not have intended to kill the woman, notwithstanding her request. I have consulted with my learned brothers, and it is our opinion that the indictment is not sufficiently proved to justify you in a verdict of guilty.' (v)

So where a similar indictment on the same statute, in different counts, alleged a gun to have been loaded with shot and various destructive materials, and it appeared that a watcher of game being out in the night, saw the prisoner crouching under a wall, and said he knew him, when he instantly raised a gun to his shoulder, and levelled it at him; he stooped to avoid it, the gun was only loaded with powder and paper, if fired so near as to be likely to kill.

If every count alleges a pistol to be loaded with ball, there must be evidence that it was so loaded.

If the indictment allege that a gun was loaded with shot and other destructive materials, there must be evidence that it was so loaded.

Where an indictment alleges that the pistol was loaded with powder and a bullet, the jury must be satisfied that it was loaded with something beyond powder and wadding, but it seems not necessary to prove that it was loaded with a bullet—a ball will suffice.

went off, and the charge, whatever it was, struck a hairy cap he had on his head, and singed the hair. There was evidence of previous ill-will, and the prisoner after his apprehension had said, 'I did it, and I rued it the instant I pulled the trigger.' A small bag of shot was found in the prisoner's pocket after he was apprehended. It was objected that there was no evidence to show that the gun was loaded with shot, or any of the destructive materials charged in the indictment, and Patteson, J., was strongly of opinion that the objection ought to prevail; and, after consulting Alderson, J., he directed an acquittal. (w)

Where an indictment for treason alleges that the prisoner discharged a pistol loaded with powder and a bullet, the jury must be satisfied that the pistol was a loaded pistol, and had something in it beyond powder and wadding; but it seems that it is not necessary for them to be satisfied that it was actually loaded with that which is generally known by the name of a bullet. An indictment for treason stated that the prisoner 'discharged a certain pistol loaded with gunpowder and a certain bullet' at the Queen: it appeared that the prisoner had discharged two pistols at the Queen, and two witnesses proved that at the time the pistols were discharged they heard something whizz by them; the prisoner had bought caps and balls before, and balls and bullet-moulds were found in his box; and he had said to a person, 'If your head had come in contact with the ball, you would have found there was a ball in the pistol.' Lord Denman, C. J., told the jury: 'The questions for your consideration are, whether the prisoner did fire the pistols, or either of them, at Her Majesty, and whether those pistols, or either of them, were or was loaded with ball at the time when they were so fired.' 'One witness says, "The prisoner was about five or six yards from the carriage when he discharged the pistol, and on the right side of it; the report of the pistol attracted my attention, and I had a distinct whizzing or buzzing before my eyes, between my face and the carriage." And another witness says, "It seemed something that whizzed past my ear; as I stood, it seemed like something quick passing my ear, but what I could not say." This is the only direct evidence; I have no means of furnishing you with any observation on that evidence; it is not matter of law, and you must bring your experience to bear upon it and couple it with the other facts of the case.' 'You will consider whether the prisoner discharged a loaded pistol.' A Juryman: 'Loaded with a bullet?' Lord Denman, C. J.: 'Or a ball.' Alderson, B.: 'Not with powder and wadding only.' (x)

But to constitute the offence of attempting to discharge loaded fire-arms, they must have been so loaded as to be capable of doing the mischief intended. So that if part of the loading had fallen out, though without the prisoner's knowledge, and that which remained was inadequate to effect the mischief, the case was not within the Act. And it seems that a case was not within the Act,

(w) Whitley's case, 1 Lew. 123. In Blake v. Barnard, 9 C. & P. 626, where a count in trespass for an assault, stated that the defendant presented a pistol 'loaded with gunpowder, ball, and shot' at the plaintiff, and there was no evidence that the pistol which the defendant presented at the plaintiff was loaded; Lord Abinger, C. B., said, 'It is stated in the declaration that the pistol was loaded with gunpowder, ball, and shot, and it is for the plaintiff to make that out, and he has not done so.'

if there was not such a loading at the time as was likely to produce a discharge, though it was possible it might produce it. The prisoner was indicted for attempting to discharge a loaded blunderbuss at J. S. The evidence was, that it had been loaded and primed a fortnight before, and that the prisoner levelled it at J. S., and drew the trigger; that the flint struck fire in the pan, but that nothing caught fire there. The blunderbuss was afterwards discharged without any fresh priming: but the powder might in the interim have been shaken through the touch-hole from the barrel into the pan. The prisoner was convicted: but the jury found that the blunderbuss was not primed at the time. Upon a case reserved, a great majority of the Judges considered this equivalent to a finding that the blunderbuss was not so loaded as to be capable of doing mischief by having the trigger drawn; and if not, that it was not loaded within the meaning of the Act: and a pardon was recommended. (y) In a case prior to this decision, it appeared that the prisoner had a loaded gun; but that, in his struggle with the prosecutor, it was probable all the powder had fallen out: he afterwards levelled it at the prosecutor, and drew the trigger. Abbott, J., told the jury, that if they thought the powder was all out before the prisoner drew the trigger, the gun could not be considered as loaded at the time; and on that ground, though with reluctance, the prisoner was acquitted. (z)

A pistol loaded with powder and balls, but its touch-hole so plugged up that it could not possibly be fired, was not 'loaded arms,' within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, ss. 11 & 12. Upon an indictment charging the prisoner with attempting to discharge a loaded pistol, by drawing the trigger, with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner pointed the pistol, which was loaded to within half an inch of its muzzle with gunpowder, paper, and two balls, at the head of the prosecutor, within four inches of his ear, and pulled the trigger; the lock went down, and the prosecutor saw a single spark from it; no mischief was done; there was no priming found in the pan, but it might have dropped out in the struggle to take the pistol from the prisoner. The prisoner's defence was, that he always kept a piece of paper in the pan, and another piece of paper twisted tightly and run into the touch-hole, so as to prevent its being fired, and the prisoner's son was called to prove that it had been in that state the day before. Patteson, J. (in summing up): 'If you think that the pistol had its touch-hole plugged, so that it could not by possibility do mischief, I think that the prisoner ought to be acquitted, because I do not think that a pistol so circumstanced ought to be considered as loaded arms, within the meaning of this Act.' (a)

And there had been several similar decisions, (b) and these cases caused the introduction of sec. 19, (c) by which, if the barrel be loaded, the case is within the statute, although the attempt to discharge may fail 'from want of proper priming, or from any other cause.'

A tin box, filled with gunpowder and peas, was not a loaded

A pistol with its touch-hole plugged up, although loaded with powder and balls, was not 'loaded arms' within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31.

arm within the meaning of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11. The prisoner sent to the prosecutor a package, of the shape and size of a cigar-box, containing a tin box with three pounds of powder and some peas in it. The box had a lid to it, to put on and pull off. The object of the prisoner was, that the prosecutor should set fire to the powder in the act of opening the box, by exploding two fulminating matches which were fixed to the top and bottom of the box. Upon a case reserved upon the question whether the thing in question came within the description of loaded arms, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the means used were not loaded arms within the Act. (d)

Shooting with the barrel of a gun separated from the stock was sufficient.

It was a sufficient 'shooting' within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, to discharge the barrel of a gun, when separated from the stock, by means of striking the percussion cap with a knife. Upon an indictment for shooting with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner, being caught poaching, ran away and was pursued by the prosecutor, who caught him, and took the stock and locks of a gun from one of his pockets: the prisoner then took the barrels from another pocket, and struck the percussion cap with something, which the prosecutor supposed to be a knife, and thereby fired one of the barrels and shot the prosecutor: it was objected that the Act only applied to shooting with a complete fire-arm; that the statute first provided for the actual shooting, and secondly against all attempts to discharge loaded arms, and as the latter clause was limited to attempts with loaded arms, which could only apply to complete arms, so must the former clause; but it was held that the case was within the statute. (c)

Some act must be done to prove an attempt to discharge fire-arms. Merely presenting them is not sufficient.

Upon an indictment under the 1 Viet. c. 85, for attempting to discharge loaded fire-arms at a person, there must have been some act shown to have been done by the prisoner to prove that he did attempt to discharge the fire-arms, and merely presenting them was not sufficient. Upon an indictment for attempting to discharge a blunderbuss with intent to murder, &c., it appeared that the prisoner went to the house of the prosecutor, and asked him for some title-deeds which he held as a security. The prosecutor told him he could not let him have them: the prisoner said, 'Then you are a dead man; ' unfolded a great coat, which he had on his arm, and took out a blunderbuss. A person who was near him seized him by the two arms, and he was secured; the muzzle of the blunderbuss was towards the side of the room where the prosecutor was, but was not pointed at him; the prisoner's intention, whatever it was, was prevented by the person laying hold of him: the blunderbuss was primed, and very heavily loaded, but it had no flint in it; the flint was found beneath the lining of the coat, from which the prisoner took the blunderbuss. Arabin,

(d) Rex v. Mountford, R. & M. C. C. R. 441; 7 C. & P. 242. A further question, which was not decided by the Judges, was whether as the explosion was intended to have been, and must have been effected (if at all) by the agency of another, it was an attempt to discharge loaded arms at the prosecutor within the meaning of the Act; upon this Alderson, B., said, 'The principle is laid down by Holtroyd, J., in Hott v. Wilks, 3 B. & A. 315. If one person makes use of another, who is a mere instrument to do an act, the thing done is the act not of him who is merely the instrument, but of the person who uses him as an instrument.'

(c) Rex v. Coates, 6 C. & P. 394, and MS. C. S. G., Patteson, J. His lordship consulted several other Judges, who agreed with him in opinion, otherwise the case would have been reserved.

Serjeant, after consulting Patteson, J., told the jury that they were both of opinion that, to sustain the indictment, there must be something more than the mere presenting of the blunderbuss, and that some act must be shown to have been done by the prisoner, to satisfy the jury that he did in fact attempt to discharge the blunderbuss. (f)

The object of the Act was to punish proximate attempts; that is, those attempts which immediately lead to the discharge of loaded arms. The words, 'in any other manner,' mean something analogous to drawing the trigger, which is the proximate cause of the loaded arm going off. Upon an indictment on the 1 Vict. c. 85, ss. 3 & 4, for attempting to discharge a pistol loaded with powder and ball, with intent to murder, &c., some counts of which charged the attempt to have been made by drawing the trigger, others by putting the finger and thumb upon the trigger, and others simply charged that the prisoner did attempt to discharge the pistol; a witness said, 'The prisoner took out a small pistol, and said, "I will settle you," or "I will do you;" the prisoner either half or full cocked the pistol, and pointed the muzzle at my brother, and against his trousers. I rushed at the pistol, and put my right hand over the muzzle of the pistol, and my other hand over the cock; I found the prisoner's finger pulling; his finger was on the trigger; I plainly felt the finger of his right hand on the trigger, and my hand did not allow the trigger to go back: the people interfered, and they were separated.' Parke, B.: 'It appears to me that the charge of felony cannot be supported, as it is not proved that the prisoner drew the trigger. The words "in any other manner," in the statute, mean something analogous to drawing the trigger, which is the proximate cause of the loaded arm going off. Suppose, for instance, you had a matchlock, and put a match to it, and the gun did not go off, that would be a case within the Act of Parliament; but here there is no proof that the prisoner drew the trigger, though he put his finger to it; and he cannot, therefore, be convicted on those counts which charge him with so doing, or which charge him with a felonious attempt to discharge the pistol, for it must be an attempt ejusdem generis; the consequence is, he cannot be convicted of a felony.' It was then urged for the prosecution that the clause in this Act said, that if a party should attempt, by drawing the trigger, or in any other manner, to discharge the loaded arm, he should be guilty of the offence. If, therefore, a man put his hand on a trigger, in order to fire the pistol, and could not do it, because the pistol happened to be at half cock, that would be within the meaning of the statute. Parke, B.: 'Here was a trigger to be drawn, and it is not drawn. It seems to me that the object of this Act was to punish proximate attempts, that is, those attempts which immediately lead to the discharge of loaded arms; therefore, if a person drew the trigger, and the gun was loaded, in that case the offence would be complete, though the gun did not go off, and though it did not happen to strike the percussion cup; and the Act also provides for the case of fire-arms which do not go off with the ordinary lock. Suppose, therefore, a man was to come with a matchlock, and attempt to discharge it,

The object of the Act was to punish those attempts which immediately lead to the discharge of loaded arms.

by putting a fusee or a brimstone match to the touch-hole, that would be an attempt to discharge it within the meaning of this Act; and so since the newly-invented fire-arms, if a man with a hammer were to strike the cap, that would be a felony under this Act of Parliament; and, as I thought a point of this kind would be taken, I have availed myself of an opportunity which I had of consulting my brother Williams, who agrees with me in opinion.' (g)

Cutting.

Intention.

If a cutting were inflicted, the case was within the statute, though the instrument were not intended for cutting, nor ordinarily used to cut, but generally used to force open drawers, doors, &c.; and though the intention was not to cut, but to inflict some other mischief. The prisoner was indicted for cutting and stabbing. It appeared that he was seized for a robbery; and, in order to escape, struck the prosecutor on the head with an iron crow, which cut out part of his skull. The instrument was sharp at one end so as probably to cut. A case was reserved, because this was an instrument to force open doors, drawers, &c., and not to cut; and because the prisoner meant to break or lacerate the head, not to cut it; but the conviction was held right. (h)

Cutting a child's private parts, so as to enlarge them for the time, may be considered as doing her grievous bodily harm: and as done with that intent, though the hymen is not injured, the incision is not deep, and the wound eventually is not dangerous. The prisoner cut a female child, ten years old, in her private parts, probably to enlarge them to admit his entrance, but he was interrupted and fled; the wound was small, but bled a good deal; and when a surgeon saw it, four days afterwards, he found it near an inch in length, not deep nor dangerous, because below the hymen; but if it had entered the hymen it would have been dangerous. Graham, B., left it to the jury to say, whether this was not a grievous bodily injury; and if so, then, though there might have been an ulterior intention to commit a rape, yet, if there was an intent to do grievous bodily harm, the case was within the Act; and that the intention might be inferred from the cutting. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the Judges held the conviction right. (i)

Wounding.

In order to obviate the difficulties which arose under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, upon the construction of the words 'cut or stab,' the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, introduced the word 'wound,' which was also contained in the 1 Vict. c. 85; and as every cut or stab is included in the term 'wound,' the new Act has used that word only.

In order to constitute a wound, the continuity of the skin must be broken.

In order to constitute a wound, the continuity of the skin must be broken, and it is not sufficient that bones are broken, the skin not being broken. Upon an indictment for wounding, under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, it appeared that the prisoners had struck the prosecutor with an iron bar and an iron hammer, and that the collar-bone had been broken, and the end of the bone much injured by violence; and upon a case reserved, all the Judges, except Bayley, B., and Park, J. A. J., thought that there was no wound within the Act. (h)

A great Judge has said, that ‘the definition of a wound, in criminal cases, is an injury to the person, by which the skin is broken. If the skin is broken, and there was a bleeding, it is a wound.’ (l) Upon an indictment for cutting and wounding, with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner threw a hammer at the prosecutor, and hit him over his right eye and nose, and made a wound on the eye, and by the side of the nose; his head was very bloody; the hammer was a blacksmith’s finishing hammer; one end of it round, and the surface flat, the other end sharp, to draw out with. Upon a case reserved, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the injury stated in the case amounted to a wound within the statute. (m)

There must be a division of the external surface of the body to make a wound; therefore a scratch is not a wound. Upon an indictment for wounding, it appeared that the prisoner attacked the prosecutor with a butcher’s knife, and, drawing him backwards, attempted to cut his throat, and an injury (which the prosecutor described as a slight scratch) was inflicted on the throat. Parke, B.: ‘Nothing which can properly be called a wound has been inflicted in this case. A scratch is not a wound within the statute; there must, at least, be a division of the external surface of the body.’ (n)

There must be a separation of the whole skin; a separation of the cuticle, or upper skin, only is not sufficient. Upon an indictment for wounding, a medical man stated that there was a slight abrasion of the skin, not exactly a wound, but an abrasion of the cuticle; it did not penetrate farther than that; the cuticle is the upper skin; blood would issue, but in a different manner, if the whole skin was cut. Coleridge, J. (Bosanquet, J., and Colman, J., being present), told the jury: ‘It is essential for you to be quite clear that a wound was inflicted. I am inclined to understand, and my learned Brothers are of the same opinion, that if it is necessary to constitute a wound that the skin should be broken, it must be the whole skin; and it is not sufficient to show a separation of the cuticle only. You will, therefore, have to say on the first three counts, whether there was a wounding in the sense in which I have stated, viz., was there a wound — a separation of the whole skin?’ (o)

If the skin be broken internally, and not externally, it is a wound. Upon an indictment on the 1 Vict. c. 85, for wounding, a surgeon stated, ‘That the lower jaw on the left side was broken in two places; the skin was broken internally, but not externally; there was not a great deal of blood; one fracture was near the chin, and the other near the ear.’ The prisoner had struck the prosecutor with a hammer on the left side of the face, but there was no wound on the outside of the face. It was objected that this was not a wounding. Park, J. A. J.: ‘When I first read the deposition I thought there might be some doubt. In consequence of this, I consulted with my Lord Chief Justice, and considered the question very much in my own mind, and we are of opinion that it is a wounding within the meaning of the Act.' Lord Denman, C. J.: 'If it is the immediate effect of the injury, we think we cannot distinguish this from the cases which have been already decided.' Park, J. A. J., in summing up: 'A question was very properly put to us, as to whether we thought there was a wound within the meaning of the statute. We were of opinion that there was a wound; and upon consideration, I am more strongly of that opinion than I was at the outset. There must be a wounding; but if there be a wound (that is, if the skin is broken, whether there be an effusion of blood or not), it is within the statute, whether the wound is internal or external.' (p)

The external surface of the body must be divided.

A separation of the cuticle or upper skin is not sufficient.

Wounding the private parts.

On an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner had given the prosecutrix a violent kick in the private parts, and that it had been followed by an occasional discharge of blood mingled with urine, but the surgeon could not say from what precise vessels the blood originally flowed; and Patteson, J., held that the charge was not sustained; there might have been no lesion of any vessels at all; but the blood might have been discharged simply from natural causes. (q) But where on a similar indictment it appeared that a policeman had received a violent kick on his private parts, and the external skin was unbroken, but the lining membrane of the urethra was ruptured, which caused a small flow of blood, mingled with urine, for two days; Cresswell, J., held that this case was very different from the preceding, and that there was a wounding within the statute. (r)

Some instrument must have been used. A wounding by the hands or teeth was not sufficient.

It was evidently the intention of the Legislature, according to the words of the repealed statute, that the wounding should be inflicted with some instrument, and not by the hands or teeth. (s) Where, therefore, a prisoner had bit off the end of a finger, it was held, on a case reserved, that this was not a wounding within the statute. (t) So it was held that biting off the nose was not a wounding. (u) So it was ruled, on an indictment under the 1 Viet. c. 85, s. 4, that biting off the prepuce of a child three years of age was not a wounding, because the word 'wound' was used concurrently with 'cut and stab,' and inasmuch as a stab or cut must be made by an instrument, the Legislature intended by the word 'wound,' an injury (not being a stab or cut) which was made by an instrument also. (v) So where on an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, for maliciously wounding, it was proved a wound; and it was held that this internal wound was a sufficient wound to support the allegation of a wound in an indictment for murder, whether it would have been so or not on an indictment on the statute for wounding with intent, &c.

that the prisoner had thrown a quantity of concentrated sulphuric acid, commonly called oil of vitriol, into the face of the prosecutor; and the jury found, upon the evidence of the surgeons, that the effect of such act was a wound upon the face of the prosecutor; it was held, on a case reserved, that there being no instrument used, nor any immediate wound produced, the conviction was wrong. (w)

But any kind of instrument whatever was sufficient, as a bludgeon, (x) a blacksmith's finishing hammer, (y) an iron hammer, (z) a stone bottle, (a) a hedge stake, or half a rail, (b) a gun, (c) a stick or club, (d) and even a shoe, whether off or on the foot. (e)

Any kind of instrument is sufficient.

And it made no difference that there was some part of the clothing intervening between the body and the instrument with which the injury was inflicted. Upon an indictment for wounding, it appeared that the prisoner struck the prosecutor with an air-gun twice on the left side of a thick hat that he had on his head; the prosecutor had a contused wound on the left side of his head, which was made by the hard rim of the prosecutor's hat, by the violence with which the hat was struck by the prisoner, and was not occasioned by the gun alone, as the prosecutor said the gun had never come directly in contact with his head: and upon a case reserved upon a doubt whether, as the wound must in fact have been caused by the hat, and not by the gun barrel, the prisoner ought to have been convicted, the conviction was held right. (f)

Clothing intervening.

But in the new Act, the words 'by any means whatsoever' are placed immediately before the word 'wound;' and it is therefore perfectly immaterial whether the wound be inflicted with or without a weapon.

No instrument is now necessary.

The wound must be inflicted by the prisoner; if, therefore, the prosecutor, in attempting to defend himself from an attack made upon him with a knife, strike his hand against the knife, and thereby receive a wound, it is not within the Act. Upon an indictment on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11, for wounding, it appeared that the prisoner attacked the prosecutor with a butcher's

Lord Tenterden, C. In Elmsly's case, 2 Lew. 126, Alderson, B., thought that the bite of a dog would be within the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; it did not, however, become necessary to decide the point, otherwise the case would have been reserved. In Rex v. Hughes, 2 C. & P. 420, Park, J. A. J., held that severe wounds inflicted on a sheep by a dog which the prisoner had set at it, was not a wounding within the 4 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 2.

knife; the prosecutor succeeded in warding off all hurt except a slight scratch on his throat, by lifting his two hands up to his throat, but in doing this his hands struck against the knife and were cut. Parke, B.: 'A scratch is not a wound within the statute; there must at least be a division of the external surface of the body; the cuts on the hands are indeed wounds; but it appears that they were inflicted by the prosecutor himself in the attempt to defend himself from the prisoner's attack; those cuts, therefore, cannot be considered wounds inflicted by the prisoner with intent to murder or maim the prosecutor.' (g) So where on an indictment for wounding with intent to maim, &c., the prosecutor proved that he endeavoured to persuade the prisoner to leave a public-house, and that the prisoner knocked him over a form with his fists, in one of which he appeared to have some instrument: when the prosecutor recovered his legs, he put forth his hand to ward off the attack of the prisoner, and in so doing he pushed it against the right hand of the prisoner, in which was a penknife, which ran into the prosecutor's finger just deep enough to bring blood. The prisoner seemed to hold the knife in his hand, and to use it as if he was attempting to cut the frock of the prosecutor, and the frock bore three long marks as if it had been slit downwards by cuts from the knife, and there were several scars through which the knife had not penetrated. Parke, B., held that there was an end to the charge of felony, as the prosecutor's hand came in contact with the knife at a moment when no intention existed in the mind of the prisoner to inflict any wound on his person. (h) And where on an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner knocked the prosecutor down with a stick on a tram-road; and it was contended that the wound was caused by the fall on the iron trams; Talfourd, J., told the jury, that in order to convict the prisoner the wound must be direct, and if they should be of opinion that the injury was the result of a fall, although occasioned by a blow from the prisoner, that would not be sufficient. (i)

The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, contained a proviso, that if it appeared that the acts of shooting, attempting to discharge loaded arms, or stabbing, cutting, or wounding, with intent to maim, &c., were committed under such circumstances, that if death had ensued, the same would not have been murder, the prisoner should be acquitted, and a similar proviso was contained in the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58. The introduction of this proviso caused many persons, who deserved very severe punishment, to escape, and in order to remedy that mischief the proviso is entirely omitted in the later Acts.

Under the 1 Vict. c. 85, therefore, it was no defence that the offence would not have been murder if death had ensued. Upon a case reserved upon the question, whether since the 1 Vict. c. 85, it was a defence to an indictment for wounding with intent to maim, &c., that if death had ensued the offence would not have been murder but manslaughter: all the Judges thought that it was no defence, except Lord Denman, C. J., and Littledale J., who doubted. (k) So where on an indictment for wounding, it appeared that the prisoner had wounded the prosecutor under such circumstances, that if he had died it would only have been manslaughter; Alderson, B., held the case within the Act, saying, 'If this had been a case under the former Act of Parliament, the prisoner would have been entitled to his acquittal, because if death had ensued there would only have been a bad case of manslaughter; but under the law as it now stands, it is only necessary that the offence should have been committed maliciously, and with some of the intents laid in the indictment: however, by the term "maliciously," is not meant with malice aforethought; that would constitute a still more grave offence, as that would show an intent to murder.' (l)

It has been held, that upon an indictment for attempting to drown, it must be shown clearly that the acts were done with intent to drown. An indictment on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11, alleged, that the prisoner assaulted G. T. and J. C., and with a boat-hook made holes in a boat in which they were, with intent to drown them. G. T. and J. C., two little boys, were attempting to land out of a boat they had punted across the Ouse, across which there was a disputed right of ferry: the prisoner attacked the boat with his boat-hook in order to prevent them, and by means of the holes which he made in it caused it to fill with water, and then pushed it away from the shore, whereby the boys were put in peril of being drowned. If he had wished it, the boat was so near he might easily have got into the boat and thrown them into the water; instead of which he confined his attack to the boat itself, as if to prevent their landing, but apparently regardless of the consequences. Coltman, J., stopped the case, being of opinion, that an assault in fact upon the two boys ought to have been proved, seeing that the prisoner had the opportunity of attacking them personally, which he did not do, and the means by which he attacked the boat indicating an intention rather to prevent their landing than to do them any injury. (m)

A mere delivery into the hand did not constitute an administering of poison within the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58; and it seems that taking it into the mouth was not sufficient, but that some part of the poison must have been actually swallowed. The prisoner was indicted under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, for administering white arsenic

Nicholls, 9 C. & P. 267, where Gurney, B., expressed a similar opinion; the cases on the Black Act, the 9 Geo. 1, c. 22, were relied upon as in point. It was held that the words of that Act, 'If any person or persons shall wilfully and maliciously shoot, &c., made malice an essential ingredient in the offence; and, therefore, that no act of shooting amounted, under that Act, to a capital offence, unless the crime would have been murder if death had ensued. and sulphate of copper, with intent to murder. It appeared that the prisoner pulled a white bread cake out of his pocket, and pinched off a bit from the outside of it, and gave it the prosecutrix to eat, and she took it and put it into her mouth, but spit it out again, and did not swallow any part of it; it was proved that the cake contained arsenic and sulphate of copper: it was objected that it ought to be proved that the poison was swallowed by, or taken into the stomach of, the person intended to be poisoned; and upon a case reserved, the Judges seemed to think swallowing not essential; but they were of opinion that a mere delivery to the woman did not constitute an administering; and that upon a statute so highly penal they ought not to go beyond what was meant by the word 'administering,' and a pardon was therefore recommended. (n) or causing to be taken.

If a person mix poison with coffee, and tell another that the coffee is for her, and she take it in consequence, it seems that this is an administering; and, at all events, it is a causing the poison to be taken. Upon an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31, s. 11, some counts of which charged that the prisoner 'administered,' and others, that she 'caused to be taken,' poison, with intent to murder, &c., it appeared that a coffee-pot, which was proved to contain arsenic, mixed with coffee, was standing by the side of the grate: the prosecutrix was going to put out some tea, but on the prisoner telling her that the coffee was for her, she poured out some for herself, and drank it, and in about five minutes became very ill. It was objected that the mere mixing of poison, and leaving it in some place for the person to take it, was not sufficient to constitute an administering; and Rex v. Cadman (a) was relied on, as showing that the delivery of the poison by the hand of the prisoner is the main ingredient of the offence: that there was no count which did not require an agency on the part of the prisoner. A 'causing to be taken' included an act, and so did an 'attempt to administer.' Park, J. A. J.: 'There has been much argument whether, in this case, there has been an administering of this poison. It has been contended that there must be a manual delivery of the poison, and the law, as stated in Messrs. Ryan & Moody's Reports, goes that way; but as my note differs from that report, and also from my own feelings, I am inclined to think that some mistake has crept into that report. It is there stated that the Judges thought the swallowing of the poison not essential; but my recollection is, that the Judges held just the contrary. I am inclined to hold that there was an administering here; and I am of opinion that, to constitute an administering, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by the hand. With respect to the question, whether the prisoner "did cause the poison to be

Supp. 237, where the same case is reported, it is said, that the Judges held that it was no administering, unless the poison was taken into the stomach; and in Rex v. Harley, 4 C. & P. 369, Park, J. A. J., said, that his note of this case was, 'that the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the poison had not been administered, because it had not been taken into the stomach, but only into the mouth; and this, certainly, is confirmed by the fact, that a pardon was recommended, which would be correct according to this view of the decision; but incorrect, if it was sufficient to prove that the poison was taken into the mouth, as that was proved to have been done. taken" by Mrs. S., it has been proved that she said that she put the coffee-pot down for Mrs. S., and that upon this Mrs. S. drank some of the coffee: and if you believe the evidence of Mrs. S., I am of opinion that this is a "causing to be taken," within the Act of Parliament.' (p)

On an indictment for attempting to administer poison it appeared that the prisoner had bought some salts of sorrel, and put it in a sugar-basin in order that the prosecutor might take it with his tea, and the prosecutor and his wife took some of it with their tea, and discovered that something was wrong, and this led to a discovery of the poison; Wightman, J., held, that if the prisoner put the poison in the sugar intending that it should be taken, that was an attempt to administer it. (q)

If A. delivered poison to B. for the purpose of his administering it to C. in A.'s absence, A. was not liable to be convicted under the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, of an attempt to administer poison to C., if B. were a guilty agent. The prisoners were indicted for attempting to administer poison to T. Vaughan with intent to murder him. The prisoners had procured arsenic, and gave it in a paper to one Edwards, telling him that it was poison, and that they wanted to kill Vaughan and his wife; they directed him to keep it in the palm of his hand, and to go to Vaughan's house, two or three miles distant, and call for a pint of beer, which he and the Vaughans were to drink together, and after having done so he was to call for another pint, and take an opportunity of slipping the arsenic into it unobserved by the Vaughans, to whom he was to hand it, that they might drink it and be poisoned. Edwards went to the Vaughans, told them what had passed, and gave up the poison. The jury having convicted, a case was reserved on the point whether the facts warranted the conviction of the prisoners of an attempt to administer poison. Edwards would have been the sole principal, and the prisoners would have been accessories before the fact. The question was, whether the delivery of poison to an agent with directions to him to cause it to be administered to another under such circumstances that, if administered, the agent would have been the sole principal, was an attempt to administer within the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3; and the Judges were unanimously of opinion that it was not, and that the conviction was wrong. (r)

Where upon an indictment on the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 4, for unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner was about to leave his situation as manager of a shop, and that he put a quantity of croton oil into the sugar-basin which was to be used by the prosecutor, his successor, who took some of the sugar and immediately became ill, and for some hours suffered dreadful pain and agony, so much so as to alarm the medical man who attended him for his life; and the prisoner had stated that he gave the croton oil to the prosecutor because he was determined to give him a good scourging, for that he had told so many stories of him. Croton oil is a very acrid poison, and highly dangerous, but occasionally administered as a medicine. It was contended that the section did not apply unless there was an assault committed, but no judgment was delivered, as the prisoner died. (s)

Where the prisoner put into a cup of tea, which the prosecutrix was about to drink, a quantity of cantharides, and she drank the contents of the cup, and was very ill in consequence. Cantharides taken in large quantities is poisonous; but it is administered by medical men as a stimulant to the kidneys and bladder. It is also administered to procure abortion, and to excite sexual passion and desire. The jury found that the prisoner administered the cantharides to, and caused it to be taken by, the prosecutrix, with the intent to excite her sexual passion and desire, in order that he might obtain connection with her; and upon a case reserved upon the question whether the intent above stated was an intent to injure, or to aggrieve or to annoy within the 23 Vict. c. 8, the conviction was affirmed. (t)

Mr. Starkie, in his excellent work on evidence, (u) makes the following observations: 'Upon an indictment for shooting or cutting another, with intent to murder or maim him, or to do him some grievous bodily harm, whether the act was done by the prisoner, with the particular intention wherewith it is charged to have been done, is, as in other cases of specific malice and intention, a question for the jury. Their inference upon this important point, as in other cases of malicious intention, must be founded upon a consideration of the situation of the parties, the conduct and declarations of the prisoner, and, above all, on the nature and extent of the violence and injurious means he has employed to effect his object. In estimating the prisoner's real intention, it is obviously of importance to consider the quantity and quality of the poison which he administered, the nature of the instrument used, and the part of the body on which the wound was inflicted, according to the plain and fundamental rule, that a man's motives and intentions are to be inferred from the means which he uses, and the acts which he does. If, with a deadly weapon, he deliberately inflicts a wound upon a vital part, where such a wound would be likely to prove fatal, a strong inference results, that his mind and intention were to destroy. It is not, however, essential to the drawing such an inference, that the wound should have been inflicted on a part where it was likely to prove mortal; such a circumstance is merely a simple and natural indication of intention, and a prisoner may be found guilty of a cutting with an intention within the statute, although the wound was inflicted on a part where it could not have proved mortal, provided the criminal intention can be clearly inferred from other circumstances.' (w)

The cutting must be expressly laid with the intent stated in the Act: as it has been holden that an indictment for cutting with intent to do some grievous bodily harm, without saying, 'in so doing,' or 'by means thereof,' was not sufficient. (x) Thus, if the intent be to prevent the prisoner's lawful apprehension, and be so found by the jury, an indictment stating a different intent will not be supported. A sexton and others surprised two body-stealers, and attempted to take them: one of them cut the sexton's assistant with a sabre: and was indicted on the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, for cutting, with the intent to murder, disable, or do some other grievous bodily harm. The jury found, that he cut with the intent to resist and prevent their apprehension, and for no other purpose. Upon a case reserved, the Judges held, that the case would not have been within the Act unless the apprehension would have been lawful; and that if the cutting was to resist or prevent a lawful apprehension, it should have been so stated, this being one of the intents mentioned in the Act: and that, as the jury had negatived the intent stated, the conviction could not be supported. (y) If the intent laid be to disable, it will be understood as of a permanent disability, and not merely one which may be temporary, as a disability until an offender likely to be apprehended may escape. The prisoner had broken into a shop in the night: and, in order to prevent a watchman apprehending him there, gave the watchman two severe cuts with the sharp part of a crow-bar. The indictment was for cutting, with intent to murder, maim, and disable: and there was no count charging the prisoner with the intent of preventing his own lawful apprehension: and the jury found that he cut to disable till he could effect his own escape. Upon a case reserved, ten Judges held the conviction wrong; for, by the finding of the jury, the prisoner intended to produce only a temporary disability, till he could escape, not a permanent disability. (z)

The intent must be properly laid.

Intent to disable.

Where on an indictment for wounding with intent to murder, maim, disable, or do some grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner's goods had been distrained for rent, and one of the broker's men turned out of the room, and the broker said, 'Break the door open and go in and take possession again;' and the prisoner said, 'he would split open the head of any person who opened the door;' the door was then forced open, and as the prosecutor was entering the room, the prisoner, who had an axe in his hand, struck him on the head with it and inflicted a cut of about a quarter of an inch, and a graze of about half an inch on the forehead; the axe had cut through the skin and flesh, but very little below the surface of the skin; Parke, B., told the jury there was no proof of an intent to maim and disable, as the blow was aimed at the head of the prosecutor; it would have been otherwise, if it had been aimed at his arm to prevent him being able to use it. The question, therefore, was, whether there was a wounding with intent either to murder the prosecutor or to do him some grievous bodily harm.' (a)

Intent to maim or disable.

Park, J., who said that it had been so held by the Judges. It is obvious that a case may fall both within the letter and the spirit of the statute, although from accident or from ignorance the prisoner has not succeeded in reaching a vital part.—Note by Mr. Starkie.

If a person wound in order to enable him to rob, he may be convicted if he also intended to disable.

But although the intent laid be that of doing grievous bodily harm, and upon the evidence it appears that the prisoner's main and principal intent was, to prevent his lawful apprehension, yet he may be convicted, if, in order to effect the latter intent, he also intended to do grievous bodily harm. The prisoner was engaged in poaching, and had fired his gun at one of three keepers, who, being on the watch for poachers, suddenly sprung up, and were rushing forwards to seize him. The jury were of opinion, that the prisoner's motive was to prevent his lawful apprehension: but that, in order to effect that purpose, he had also the intention of doing the keeper some grievous bodily harm. Upon objection taken, the learned Judge was of opinion, that if both intents existed, the question, which was the principal, and which was the subordinate intention, was immaterial: and, upon a case reserved, it was held, that if both the intents existed, it was immaterial which was the principal, and which the subordinate one; and that the conviction was therefore proper. (b)

So if a person wounded for the purpose of accomplishing a robbery, he might be convicted under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, if the jury found that he intended to disable or do grievous bodily harm. Upon an indictment containing counts for wounding with intent to prevent his lawful apprehension, to disable, and to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner threw the prosecutor down, tried to take his watch by pulling at the chain, the prosecutor put down his hand to prevent him, the prisoner kicked him in the mouth several times with violence; he bled very much from the mouth and nose, and the skin of his face was cut near the lips. Lord Denman, C. J. (Vaughan, B., being present), left it to the jury to say, whether the prisoner's intent was either to disable the prosecutor, or to do him some grievous bodily harm by the violence which he used. Nothing was more likely to accomplish the robbery which he had in view than the disabling which such violence would produce. The intent in the first count could hardly be said to be proved, as no endeavour to apprehend was made at the time. (c) So where upon an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prosecutor received a blow, and was severely wounded, and immediately robbed of his money, and there was evidence that there were two persons present, but no evidence to show which of them struck the prosecutor: Coleridge, J., directed the jury, that if they believed that the prisoner inflicted the wound on the prosecutor with an intent to rob him, but had at the same time an intent to do him some grievous bodily harm in order to effectuate such his intention of robbing, then, in point of law, the prisoner ought to be convicted on this indictment, although his ultimate object might have been to rob the prosecutor. And that even if the prisoner did not with his own hand inflict the wound, he might be convicted upon this indictment, if the jury were satisfied that the prisoner and the other person were engaged in a common purpose of robbing the prosecutor, and that the other person's was the hand that inflicted the wound. (d)

On an indictment for shooting at Mr. Mahon, with a gun loaded with powder and blood, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that Mr. Mahon was preaching in church when the gun was fired through a hole previously cut in the window: he was struck on the temple, knocked back, and stunned; his face, surplice, and Bible being sprinkled with blood; there was no wound, but grains of powder were imbedded in the forehead; the eye was weak, and the effect of the blow felt for two months after. The surgeon said that had the charge struck the eye, or a place nearer to the eye, the result would have been much more serious; Willes, J., told the jury, 'You must be satisfied that the prisoner had an intent to do grievous bodily harm: it is not necessary that such harm should have been actually done, or that it should be either permanent or dangerous; if it be such as seriously to interfere with comfort or health, it is sufficient.' (e)

Intent to do

On an indictment for shooting at a person with intent to maim, &c., it appeared that the prosecutor was hunting small birds, when the prisoner, a gamekeeper, came up with his gun, and ordered him off; the prosecutor ran away, but had not got more than forty or fifty yards off when he heard the report of a gun, and at the same moment felt several shots rattling against his back and arms, one of which lodged in his finger: the prisoner afterwards said, 'He had warmed their tails a goodish bit for them;' Parke, B.: 'There can be no doubt that this is an assault, but I think the felonious part of the charge cannot be supported on these facts. In order to do so, it must appear clearly that the prisoner discharged the gun at the prosecutor with the intent laid in the indictment; but he seems to have waited till the prosecutor had attained such a distance from him as not to be injured by the shot. He would rather appear to have fired after the prosecutor with a view of frightening him than with any serious intention of inflicting any injury on his person. This conduct, though very reprehensible, is not sufficient to bring the case within the Act, and he ought, therefore, to be acquitted of the felony.' (f)

On an indictment for feloniously wounding, it appeared that the prosecutor and his companion came up to the prisoner, who was fighting with his brother, and the prosecutor's companion said they were very quarrelsome people; whereupon the prisoner knocked him down, and said he would do the same to the prosecutor, if he would fight; the prosecutor refused, and threatened to take the law, and then the prisoner struck the prosecutor a blow with his fist, which broke the prosecutor's jaw on both sides his face; Alderson, B., told the jury that striking a blow, even though grievous bodily harm is done, is not in itself sufficient to show an intent to do such grievous bodily harm; that must be proved by other circumstances. (g)

fully wounding in such a case under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, post, p. 1012.

(g) Reg. v. Wheeler, 1 Cox C. C. 106.

There might be a conviction of unlawthat the police ordered some gipsies to remove from a common by the direction of the owner of a neighbouring plantation, but not the lord of the manor; they refused to do so, and one of them assaulted one of the police, who thereupon proceeded to take him into custody. The prosecutor took hold of two of the women, and while holding them the prisoner struck him on the back with a scythe, the edge of which was fenced, except two inches at the end, inflicting a wound half an inch deep, and an inch long; it was contended that the prisoner could not be convicted even of wounding; it was like the case where a person inflicted a wound with a nail on a stick, unknown to the person using it. Bramwell, B.: 'The police had no right to interfere with the gipsies, except by the order of the owner of the land, and their resistance, without the use of weapons, would have been justifiable. As to the felony charged, a man is generally supposed, by the law, to intend the natural consequence of his act; but in this case it is not so, and to find the prisoner guilty of the felony, you must be satisfied of the existence of the actual intent to wound. As to the unlawful wounding, if this case were like that put by the counsel for the prisoner, she would not be guilty. But it is for you to say whether, though the prisoner did not intend to wound, she did not know that the end of the scythe was uncovered, and therefore likely to wound. Suppose you fired a gun, loaded with shot, at a person, but at such a distance that you did not think it would reach him, and some of the shots did, that would be an unlawful wounding. You will say whether the prisoner is guilty of wounding with intent of unlawful wounding, or not guilty.' (h)

Where a party having a deadly weapon in his possession, in his own defence, but without having retreated previously as far as possible, cuts a person who is assaulting him, he is guilty of maliciously wounding, if he intended to inflict grievous bodily harm.

Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner got into an altercation with the prosecutor, and challenged him to fight; that he put down the blade of a scythe, and advanced towards the prosecutor to fight, but was prevented; afterwards the prosecutor challenged the prisoner to fight, but they were again prevented, and the prosecutor and his party left, and some time after the prisoner and two other men followed the prosecutor and passed him. The prosecutor and his party followed, and challenged the prisoner to fight, and used provoking language. The prisoner then took his own road, and the prosecutor followed him, and again challenged him to fight, which the prisoner refused, and said he would go back, and take the peace of him, and actually went back a few steps for that purpose: but the prosecutor got before him, and was making towards him, when the prisoner flourished his scythe, and told him to stand back, or he would cut him down, and himself retreated a few steps; the prosecutor sprang on him, and seized him by the collar; a scuffle ensued, in which the prisoner struck the prosecutor across the shoulder with the scythe, and produced a severe wound. Cresswell, J.: 'The recent Act (1 Vict., c. 85), having omitted the proviso contained in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, the Judges have determined that the facts will bring a case within this statute, if the offence

(h) Reg. v. Cox, 1 F. & F. 664. Probably this case is misreported, as it is quite clear that if a person, by unlawful violence, inflicts a wound, he is guilty of unlawful wounding, though he did not intend to wound.

would have amounted to manslaughter, in case death had ensued. If the act was done unlawfully and maliciously, that is, without lawful excuse, and intentionally, it is enough. Maliciously does not mean with premeditated malice, as in murder; an intention to do the mischief unlawfully will satisfy the statute. Now, in order to render a case of homicide, committed with a deadly weapon, lawful on the ground of self-defence, it must appear that the party retreated as far as he possibly could, and then only used the weapon to avoid his own destruction. It is impossible to contend that the prisoner was so driven to use the scythe in this case; the offence would have amounted to manslaughter if death had ensued, though certainly not an aggravated one; and therefore you will be bound to say that the prisoner is guilty, if you believe he really intended to do grievous bodily harm.' (i)

Upon an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prosecutor and the prisoner were fellow-servants, and the prosecutor had told the prisoner to cut some grass, which he ought to have done, but did not do, whereupon the prosecutor took a strap, and beat the prisoner with it, when the prisoner, who had lost his right arm, took out a clasp knife, and wounded the prosecutor with it. Platt, B.: 'One servant has clearly no right to strike another; and if an under-servant conducts himself in a way in which the upper-servant thinks he ought not, the latter should inform his master, and let him act as he thinks proper, either by dismissing the under-servant or otherwise. In an ordinary case, a wrongful beating with a strap would not justify the other party in resorting to a knife, but there is certainly in this case the distinction that the prisoner has lost his right arm. The assault of the prisoner by the prosecutor was clearly illegal and unjustifiable, and if, under all the circumstances, you think that the prisoner acted in self-defence only, you ought to acquit him; but if you think that in defending himself the prisoner used more violence than was necessary, you ought to find him guilty of wounding without the intent mentioned in the indictment.' (k)

Wounding of one servant by another.

Although upon an indictment for wounding, with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or do some grievous bodily harm, it is now no defence that the wound was inflicted under such circumstances, that if death had ensued it would not have amounted to the crime of murder, yet as it is usual to insert a count charging an intent to murder, and the sentence on such a count is usually very severe, it may often become very material to decide whether the case would have been murder if death had ensued; in this view the following cases are still important. (l)

Where the offence is charged to have been committed with intent to obstruct, &c. a lawful apprehension, it must be shown that the offender had some notification of the purpose for which he was apprehended before he inflicted the wound. Upon an indictment on the 43 Geo. 3. c. 58, it appeared that, in the morning of the day mentioned in the indictment, the prisoner stole some wheat from an outhouse belonging to one Spilsbury; and the must appear that the offender had some notification of the purpose for which he was apprehended.

wheat being soon after found concealed in an adjoining field, Spilsbury, Webb, and others, watched near the spot, expecting that the thief would come to carry it away, and that they should thus be able to discover and apprehend him. In the course of the day the prisoner and another man walked into the field, and lifted up the bag containing the wheat. They were immediately pursued; and Webb seized the prisoner, without desiring him to surrender, or stating for what reason he was apprehended. A scuffle ensued, during which, before Webb had spoken, the prisoner drew a knife, and cut him across the throat. Lawrence, J., held that, as Webb did not communicate to the prisoner the purpose for which he seized him, the case did not come within the statute; for if death had ensued, it would only have been manslaughter. But he said, that if a proper notification had been made before the cutting, the case would have assumed a different complexion. (m)

But where, in a case somewhat similar, the goods had been concealed by the thief in an outhouse, and the owner, together with a special constable under the Watch and Ward Act, waited at night to apprehend the thief when he came to take away the goods, and the prisoner and another came at night and removed the goods from the place where they were deposited, and upon an attempt to apprehend them, the prisoner fled, and was pursued by the owner of the goods, who cried out after him several times in a loud voice, 'Stop thief!' and on being overtaken, the prisoner drew a knife, with which he cut the hands of the prosecutor, and made many attempts to cut his throat, the prisoner was convicted and executed. (n)

So where upon a count of an indictment which charged the prisoner with maliciously wounding the prosecutor with intent to resist his apprehension for an offence for which he was liable to be apprehended, viz., for wilfully and maliciously committing damage upon certain plants and roots growing in a certain garden, it appeared that the prosecutor, a constable of the Metropolitan Police Force, while on duty, found the prisoner in the night-time in an enclosed garden, stooping down close to the ground, on which the prisoner ran away, and the prosecutor ran after him, and caught him getting over a hedge, and he was then in the garden; he caught him by the collar of the jacket, on which the prisoner drew a knife, and cut the prosecutor on the forehead between the eyes, and in a scuffle which ensued in several other places. The prisoner when found was cutting or plucking some pickatees and carnations. The jury found that the prisoner had wilfully and maliciously plucked and cut flowers from plants or roots in the garden, with intent to steal the flowers, and that he was found by the prosecutor, who belonged to the police force, committing that offence, but that the prosecutor did not inform the prisoner by word of mouth that he did belong to the police force; and that the prisoner had the knife in his hand at the time

(m) Rex v. Ricketts, 3 Camp. 68. The prisoner was afterwards found guilty of larceny in stealing the wheat. It seems to me that this decision may well be doubted, as the facts must have told the prisoner for what he was apprehended. See the cases on this subject, ante, p. 835. C. S. G.

with which he had been cutting the flowers; and found him guilty on the above count. Littledale, J., reserved the question whether, considering the finding of the jury, the offence committed by the prisoner fell within the 42nd or 43rd sections of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, or the 22nd, 23rd, or 24th sections of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30. Supposing the offence fell within either of these statutes, there did not appear to the learned Judge much doubt as to the authority of the prosecutor to apprehend him under the 63rd section of the one Act, or the 28th of the other, as the case might be, so as to prove this count; and upon consideration the Judges held the conviction right upon this count. (o)

Upon an indictment for shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner, being a constable, was employed to guard a copse from which wood had been stolen, and for this purpose he carried a loaded gun. From this copse he saw the prosecutor come out, carrying wood which he was stealing, and called to him to stop. The prosecutor ran away, and the prisoner, having no other means of bringing him to justice, fired and wounded him in the leg. It was alleged that the prosecutor was actually committing a felony, he having been before repeatedly convicted of stealing wood; but these convictions were unknown to the prisoner, and there was no reason for supposing that he knew the difference between the rules of law relating to felony and those relating to less offences. Erle, J., told the jury, that 'shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm amounted to the felony charged, unless from other facts there was a justification; and that neither the belief of the prisoner that it was his duty to fire, if he could not otherwise apprehend the prosecutor; nor the alleged felony, it being unknown to him, constituted such justification.' The jury convicted; and, upon a case reserved, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the prisoner was not justified in firing at the prosecutor, because the fact that the prosecutor was committing a felony was not known to the prisoner at the time, and therefore the conviction was right. (p)

In a case where a point was made, whether the shooting with which the prisoner was charged was by accident or design, it was held, that proof might be given that the prisoner at another time shot intentionally at the same person. Pearce, the prosecutor, who was a gamekeeper, proved that he met the prisoner sporting upon his manor, and remonstrated with him for so doing; and proposed that the prisoner should go with him to the steward, saying, that if the steward would pardon him he should have no

A constable, who sees a person running away with goods, is not justified in shooting at such person, although he cannot catch him, unless he knows that he has committed a felony in taking such goods. It is not sufficient that it turns out afterwards that he had in fact so committed a felony.

Evidence of two distinct acts of malicious shooting admitted as part of the transaction, and to show that the act of shooting

(o) Rex v. Fraser, R. & M. C. C. R. 419. It should be observed that the count was framed on the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 21, for maliciously committing damage upon the plants, but the jury found that the prisoner cut the flowers with intent to steal them, which is an offence within the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29 s. 42. It may be doubted, therefore, whether the evidence supported the count. Another question arose on another count as to the construction of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 7 (the Metropolitan Police Act), but upon that no opinion was given. C. S. G.

It is not stated, but must be assumed that the prosecutor had cut down the wood he was carrying away, and that he had previously been summarily convicted before justices for a like offence. According to the statement in the case, all the prisoner saw was that the prosecutor was carrying wood away; in fact, was committing a felony; but it must be assumed the evidence showed that the prisoner knew the wood had just been cut down.

objection. The prisoner assented to go with him, and they walked together until they came near to the gamekeeper's horse, which was about sixty yards off, when Pearce went on before him towards the horse; and when he was at a short distance from the prisoner, the prisoner fired at his back, but said nothing. Pearce attempted to turn round, and saw the prisoner running, and attempted to run after him; but his back seemed to be broken, and he could not follow. He then turned back to the horse; and, after getting upon it, was making his way home to a place about two miles off, and had got about half a mile on the road, at a place where there was a hedge on each side, when he saw the prisoner again in the lowest part of one of the hedges; and the moment he looked round at him the prisoner again fired his gun, the discharge from which beat out one of Pearce's eyes and several of his teeth, but did not cause him to fall from his horse. Between the first and second firing was about a quarter of an hour. In the course of the trial it was suggested, that the prosecutor ought not to give evidence of two distinct felonies: but the learned Judge thought it unavoidable in this case, as it seemed to him to be one continued transaction, in the prosecution of the general malicious intent of the prisoner. Upon another ground also the learned Judge thought such evidence proper. The counsel for the prisoner, by his cross-examination of Pearce, had endeavoured to show, that the gun might have gone off the first time by accident; and, although the learned Judge was satisfied that this was not the case, he thought that the second firing was evidence to show, that the first, which had preceded it only a quarter of an hour, was wilful; and to remove the doubt, if any existed, in the minds of the jury. The prisoner having been convicted, the matter was submitted to the consideration of the Judges, who were of opinion, that the evidence was properly received, and the prisoner rightly convicted. Dyson's case. Where the wounding is charged to be done with the intent to obstruct, &c. a lawful apprehension, it is necessary to show that the person apprehending acted under proper authority.

It was also necessary, in proceeding upon the same clause of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, to show that the person apprehending acted under proper authority. For, where it appeared that the prisoner having previously cut a person on the cheek, several others, who were not present when the transaction took place, went to his house to apprehend him, without any warrant, and, upon their attempting to take him into custody, he inflicted the wound upon which the indictment was founded; Le Blanc, J., was of opinion, that the prosecution could not be sustained. He said, that to constitute an offence within this branch of the statute, there must be a resistance to a person having a lawful authority to apprehend the prisoner, in order to which the party must either be present when the offence was committed, or he must be armed with a warrant; and that this branch of the statute was intended to protect officers, and others armed with authority, in the apprehension of persons guilty of robberies or other felonies. (s)

Where the intent charged in three of the counts was, an intent to prevent a lawful apprehension; and, in the fourth, an intent to do the prosecutor some grievous bodily harm; and, from the nature of the facts, the case turned upon the last count only, a point was made on behalf of the prisoner, that no grievous bodily harm was done, as the cut was upon the wrist, and did not appear to have been dangerous, as it got well in about a week; and the prisoner's counsel relied upon a doubt expressed by Bayley, J., (t) whether the injury done was a grievous bodily harm contemplated by the Act, the wound not being in a vital part. Another objection was also taken upon the facts; from which it appeared, that the prisoner having been apprehended by one Headley, in an attempt to break into his stable in the night, and taken into Headley's house, threatened Headley with vengeance, and endeavoured to carry his threats into effect with a knife which had been laid before him, in order that he might take some refreshment; and, in so doing, cut the prosecutor Cambridge, one of Headley's servants, who, with Headley, was trying to take away the knife; the act happening in that struggle, and perhaps not designedly, as against Cambridge. Upon these facts, it was objected that there was no evidence of malice against the prosecutor Cambridge, but against Headley only; and that upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, general malice was not sufficient, as in the case of murder, and that malice against the particular individual was necessary. (u) A further objection was made, that the prisoner was not lawfully in custody, there being no warrant; and an attempt to commit felony being only a misdemeanor. The jury, who found the prisoner guilty, stated that the thrust was made with intent to do grievous bodily harm to anybody upon whom it might alight, though the particular cut was not calculated to do so. Upon a case reserved, the Judges were of opinion that, if there was an intent to do grievous bodily harm, it was immaterial whether grievous bodily harm was done; that general malice was sufficient under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, without any particular malice against the person cut; and that, as the prisoner was detected in the night attempting to commit a felony, he might be lawfully detained without a warrant, until he could be carried before a magistrate. (v)

In a case upon the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, the prosecutor and some other men had got hold of a woman, who, as they conceived, had been using another person ill, and said that she deserved to be ducked in a trough, which was near; but it did not appear that they intended to duck her. The prisoner, who was at some distance at the time, on being informed that they were using the woman ill, exclaimed, 'I have got a good knife,' rushed immediately to the place where she was, entered among the crowd, and instantly struck the prosecutor on the shoulder with the knife. The prosecutor turned round upon him; a struggle ensued between them; and in that struggle the prosecutor received other wounds. After they had fought for some time, the prisoner dropped the knife and ran away. The wound upon the prosecutor's shoulder was about seven inches long, and two deep; and the lap of one of his ears was cut. There was likewise a slight wound on the gland of his neck, and a cut on his left arm. The counsel for the prisoner objected, that the first count of the indictment, which stated an attempt to murder, &c., and the second count, which stated an attempt to maim, disfigure, and disable, could not be supported; and that the only question was upon the third count, which stated an intent to do some grievous bodily harm. And upon this question, he submitted, that the wounds were not of that kind from which grievous bodily harm could ensue; that the transaction was a scuffle, in which a knife was used accidentally, without any settled design to 'maim, disfigure, or disable,' or to do 'other grievous bodily harm' to the prosecutor; and also that the wounds were not inflicted in a part of the body which could produce such a consequence. Bayley, J., entertained some doubts on the case; which appear to have proceeded principally on the grounds that the wounds were not in a vital part; that it was questionable whether the injury done was a grievous bodily harm contemplated by the Act; and whether, if death had ensued, the crime would have been more than manslaughter. And, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, he directed the jury to acquit the prisoner. (w)

Where an indictment charged a shooting at A., with intent to murder A., and the jury found that he shot at A., intending to shoot at B., the prisoner was acquitted.

It was once held on an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, which charged the prisoner with shooting at A. with intent to murder A., that the prisoner could not be convicted if the jury found that he shot at A. intending to shoot at B., and that he did not intend to do A. any harm. An indictment charged the prisoner, in one set of counts, with shooting at Hill, with intent to murder Hill; and in another set with shooting at Lee, with intent to murder Lee; and it appeared that the prisoner having ill will against Lee, went to his house, and called to him to come out and be killed; and Hill, who was in the parlour with Lee, went into the hall, and the prisoner instantly fired a pistol at him, but without doing him any injury; it was objected that the prisoner must have shot at a person with intent to kill that person, and that here there was no intent to injure Hill. On the part of the crown, Rex v. Hunt (x) was cited. Littledale, J.: 'If it had not been for the case of Rex v. Hunt, I should have felt little difficulty. The question I shall leave to the jury is, whether the prisoner intended to injure Mr. Hill. But I shall tell them, that a man must be taken to intend the consequences of his acts.' His lordship said, in summing up, 'If this had been a case of murder, and the prisoner intending to murder one person, had, by mistake, murdered another, he would be equally liable to be found guilty. The question, however, may be different on the construction of this Act of Parliament. There is no doubt that the prisoner shot at Mr. Hill, and that, if death had ensued, the offence would have amounted to murder; and then it will be for you to say, whether the prisoner intended to do Mr. Hill some grievous bodily harm. It certainly appears that he did not so intend in point of fact. However, the law infers that a party intends to do that which is the immediate and necessary effect of the act which he commits.' The Foreman of the Jury: 'We find him guilty of shooting at Mr. Hill, with intent to do Lee some grievous bodily harm.' Littledale, J.: 'There is no count for that. Do you find him guilty of shooting at Lee?' The Foreman: 'No; he fired at Hill, intending to fire at Lee.' Littledale, J.: 'Do you find that he intended to do harm to Hill?' The Foreman: 'We find that he did not intend to do any harm to Hill.' Littledale, J.: 'A verdict of not guilty must be recorded.' (y)

But this case can no longer be considered as an authority. Upon an indictment on the same statute, in the first count for shooting at Lockyer, and in the second for shooting at Hole, it appeared that Hole, who was a gamekeeper, and Lockyer came up to some poachers, when the prisoner levelled his gun at Hole, who was in advance, but missed him and hit Lockyer. The counsel for the prosecution had elected to proceed on the count charging the shooting at Lockyer. The counsel for the prisoner contended, that the prisoner could not be convicted in point of law of shooting at Lockyer with intent to injure him, inasmuch as the person aimed at, according to the evidence, was another, and Lockyer was only struck accidentally. Gurney, B., in summing up, told the jury it was perfectly immaterial for whom the shot was intended. If a man laid poison for one person, and another took it and died, it would be murder; so a blow aimed at one person and killing another, would make the party equally answerable. (z)

Shooting at one person and hitting another.

On an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner had recently had a quarrel with another man in a public-house, and had waited outside for the purpose of attacking him when he should come out: the prosecutor, with whom the prisoner had had no dispute, was the first to leave the house, and being mistaken by the prisoner for his former antagonist, he gave him the wound in question. It was contended that the intent was not proved, and Rex v. Holt (a) was cited. Alderson, B.: 'If Rex v. Holt lays down the position you contend for, I shall certainly overrule it. I do not think it is either law or good sense. I shall direct the jury, that if they think the prisoner did to the prosecutor what he intended to do to another man, they must find him guilty.' (b)

Wounding one person supposing him to be another.

Upon an indictment for wounding W. Taylor with intent to murder him, it appeared that the prisoner intended to murder one Maloney; and, supposing Taylor to be Maloney, shot at and wounded Taylor; and the jury found that the prisoner intended to murder Maloney, not knowing that the party he shot at was Taylor, but supposing him to be Maloney, and that he intended to Wounding one person in mistake for another.

(y) Rex v. Holt, 7 C. & P. 518. Littledale, J., considered the second set of counts quite out of the question. His Lordship said, in the course of the case, 'Suppose this had been laid at common law as an assault, with intent to murder A., would that charge be proved by showing that the prisoner intended to murder B.? Perhaps that is almost idem per idem.'

murder the individual he shot at, supposing him to be Maloney, and convicted the prisoner; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right, for, though he did not intend to kill the particular person, he meant to murder the man at whom he shot. (c) Where on an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm to the prosecutor, it appeared that the prisoner with a knife struck at Withy, and the prosecutor interfered and caught the blow on his arm; Crowder, J., held that this would not sustain the charge; but the prisoner might be convicted of unlawfully wounding. (d)

Under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11, it was held, that if a party sent poison with intent to kill one person, and another person took that poison, it was just the same as if the poison had been intended for the person who took it. Upon an indictment on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11, for administering poison to E. Davis, it appeared that a parcel of sugar and tea, with poison in it, directed 'to be left at Mrs. Daws, Fownhope,' was left on a shop counter, and afterwards delivered to a Mrs. Davis, who used some of the sugar, and was made very ill by it. Gurney, B.: 'The question is, whether the prisoner laid this poison on the shop counter, intending to kill some one. If it was intended for Mrs. Daws, and finds its way to Mrs. Davis, and she takes it, the crime is as much within this Act of Parliament as if it had been intended for Mrs. Davis. If a person sends poison with intent to kill one person, and another person takes that poison, it is just the same as if it had been intended for such other person.' (e)

But the correctness of this ruling has been doubted, and it has been considered, that where an indictment under the 1 Vict. c. 85, states an administering of poison to a person, with intent to murder such person, it must be proved that the prisoner did intend to murder such person; but that it is sufficient, under that Act, to state that the prisoner administered poison 'with intent to commit murder' generally. An indictment on the 1 Vict. c. 85, charged the prisoner with causing poison to be taken by G. Power, with intent to murder the said G. Power; but it appeared that the prisoner's intention was to murder Catherine Power, and that G. Power had accidentally swallowed the poison, and the prisoner was found guilty. Parke, B., afterwards said he had spoken to Alderson, B., on the subject, and that they both much doubted whether the verdict could be supported, the averment of the intention not being proved as laid. He was aware that there was a case (f) where, under the old law (9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 11), a conviction had taken place, though there was a similar defect in the evidence, but he doubted the propriety of that decision; and, to provide for any such case, the language of the new statute, under which the prisoner was tried (1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2), had been altered; for under that section it was sufficient to allege that the prisoner did the act 'with intent to commit murder,' generally. The prosecutor had here unnecessarily described the intention more

(c) Reg. v. Smith, Dears. C. C. 559. This decision fully accords with my note, infra (g).

(d) Reg. v. Hewlett, 1 F. & F. 91. In this case there was no intent to injure the person wounded; it is therefore quite different from the cases where, though there is a mistake as to the person, the injury is intended for the person on whom it falls.

particularly than he need have done, but having so described it, it appeared to the learned Baron, that the prosecutor was bound to prove the intention as laid. His lordship therefore desired a fresh indictment to be prepared, alleging the intent to have been 'to commit murder' generally, under which the prisoner was tried and convicted, and sentenced to be transported for life. (g)

On an indictment for shooting at a person unknown with intent to murder him, it appeared that the prisoner, being irritated at a crowd of boys, who were following him, discharged a loaded pistol among them, and thereby wounded a person who was passing along the street: there was nothing to show any intent to shoot at any particular person, nor was the person injured one of those who were teasing him. Jervis, C. J. (Alderson, B., being present), said, 'I do not think that the charge contained in this indictment is proved; doubtless at common law, if the person wounded had been killed, it would have been murder: but this is an offence under the statute, and must be proved strictly in its very terms.' It was then proposed to amend the indictment, by charging the prisoner with an intent to murder in the words of the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2. Jervis, C. J.: 'That would no doubt be a good indictment after

Shooting down

(g) Reg. v. Ryan, 2 M. & Rob. 213. It seems probable that the intention of the Legislature in providing, by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, and the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, for attempts to commit murder, was to punish every attempt where, in case death had ensued, the crime would have amounted to murder; and the proviso in those statutes, that if the acts were committed under such circumstances that if death had ensued it would not have amounted to the crime of murder, the prisoner should be acquitted, tends to show that the Legislature so intended. The tendency of the cases, however, seems to be, that an actual intent to murder the particular individual injured must have been shown under those statutes, and also under the 1 Vict. c. 85, where the intent is so laid. Where a mistake of one person for another occurs, the cases of shooting, &c. may, perhaps, admit of a different consideration from the cases of poisoning. In the case of shooting at one person under the supposition that he is another, although there be a mistake, the prisoner must intend to murder that individual at whom he shoots; it is true he may be mistaken in fact as to the person, and that it may be owing to such mistake that he shoots at such person, but still he shoots with intent to kill that person. So in the case of cutting; a man may cut one person under a mistake that he is another person, but still he must intend to murder the man whose throat he cuts. In Reg. v. Mister, Salop Spr. Ass. 1841, cor. Gurney, B., the only count charging an intent to murder was the first, and that alleged the intent to be to murder Mackreth; and although on the evidence it was perfectly clear that Mister mistook Mackreth for Ludlow, whom he had followed for several days before, yet he was convicted and executed, and I believe the point never noticed at all. The case of poisoning one person by mistake for another seems different, if the poison be taken in the absence of the prisoner; for in such case he can have no actual intent to injure that person. These difficulties, however, seem to be obviated by the 1 Vict. c. 85, which, instead of using the words 'with intent to murder such person,' has the words 'with intent to commit murder.' It may perhaps be doubted whether this alteration was not intended to enable the prosecutor to charge a shooting at one person with intent to murder another person; and doubts may perhaps be entertained, notwithstanding the very great weight due to any opinion of the very learned Barons, who considered this point in Reg. v. Ryan, whether a count, stating a shooting with intent to commit murder, would not be bad on demurrer, in arrest of judgment, and on error, for not stating the person intended to be murdered. It is true that it would follow the words of the Act; but in many cases that is not sufficient. Thus in Reg. v. Martin, 8 Ad. & E. 481, 3 Nev. & P. 472, it was held that an indictment for obtaining goods by false pretences was bad on error, on the ground that it did not state that the goods obtained were the property of any person. In all cases of doubt as to the intention, it would be prudent to insert one count for shooting at A. with intent to murder him; another 'with intent to commit murder;' and a third for shooting at A. with intent to murder the person really intended to be killed; and if the party intended to be killed were unknown, a count for shooting at A. with intent to murder a person to the jurors unknown. C. S. G.

verdict under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 20, being in the words of the statute; but it may be a question whether it would not be demurrable for generality. We think that if we amend, we ought to do it in such a manner as that the indictment shall not be in any way defective. The prisoner has pleaded, and he ought to have an opportunity of demurring, which now of course he cannot do. We must therefore refuse the application.' (h)

Administering poison with intent to murder was within the 1 Viet. c. 85, s. 2, though the poison was in such a state when administered that it could not prove destructive.

Upon an indictment for administering poison with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner had administered to a child nine weeks old two cocculus indicus berries. The child vomited one of them up, and the other passed through her body in the course of nature. Two medical men proved that the cocculus indicus berry is classed with narcotic poisons: the poison consists in the presence of an alkaloid, which is extracted from the kernel; all the noxious properties are in the kernel; it has a very hard exterior or pod, to break which much force is required. One of these witnesses added that the berry, if the pod is broken, is calculated to produce death in an adult human subject, though he did not know how many would be required for the purpose: he thought the poison contained in the kernels of two berries, if the pods were burst, and if retained on the stomach, might produce death in a child of nine weeks old, but that the berry could not be digested by the child, and that it would pass through its body without the pod being burst, and so would be innocuous. It was objected that the berries were not poison within the meaning of the statute; for that though the kernel of the berries contained poison, yet the pod rendered the poison innocuous. The objection was overruled, and, upon a case reserved, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. Wilde, C. J.: 'It is admitted that the kernel is poison, though not the pod; part of the berry is therefore admitted to be poison, though not the whole. The whole berry was administered, and with intent to kill. The act, therefore, of administering poison with intent to kill is proved. The effect of that act is beside the question; the act was an administering poison, which failed to produce the intended effect. We all think the conviction right.' (i)

As to whether on an indictment charging an intent to

'It is a very important question, whether on a count charging an intent to murder, it is essential that the jury should be satisfied that that intent existed in the mind of the prisoner at the time of the offence, or whether it is sufficient that it would have been

(h) Reg. v. Lallement, 6 Cox C. C. 204. It is clear that after the amendment the jury might have been discharged under the 14 & 15 Viet. c. 100, s. 1, and the Court might then have given the prisoner leave to withdraw his plea and demur to the amended indictment. This case as to the general allegation being insufficient on demurrer, accords with my former note (g). I still venture to submit that it is extremely questionable whether the indictment would not be equally bad after verdict, and I doubt whether any case can occur where an indictment may not be so framed as to meet the facts, and avoid the necessity for such a count; for wherever it is possible to prove an intent to murder any person, it is plain a count may be framed to meet that case.

(i) Reg. v. Cludero, 1 Den. C. C. 514. In the course of the argument, Alderson, B., said, 'Suppose arsenic given in a globule of glass, would that be an administering of a destructive poison?' Williams, J.: 'Suppose a child to have a feeble digestion by reason of tender age, and the medical man to say that it could not digest the pod for that reason, could the amount of the digestive power in the particular case affect the question?' Alderson, B.: 'Suppose a grown man could digest it, would it be poison? if so, would it cease to be poison because a child is supposed to be incapable of doing so?'

a case of murder had death ensued;’ (k) and this question does not seem to be completely settled. In a case where a man was indicted for inflicting an injury dangerous to life on a child, with intent to murder it, and his wife as principal in the second degree, for aiding and abetting him, where it appeared that the prisoners had inflicted great violence on the child, Patteson, J., told the jury, ‘Before you can find the prisoner, T. C., guilty of this felony, you must be satisfied that when he inflicted this violence on the child, he had in his mind a positive intention of murdering that child. Even if he did it under circumstances which would have amounted to murder if death had ensued, that will not be sufficient, unless he actually intended to commit murder. With respect to the wife, it is essential not only that she should have assisted her husband in the commission of the offence, but also that she should have known that it was her husband’s intention to commit murder.’ (l) But in another case, where the first count charged the prisoner with shooting with intent to murder, and the facts were such as only to amount to manslaughter, the same very learned Judge said, in summing up, ‘It is a very important question, whether, on a count charging an intent to murder, it is essential that the jury should be satisfied that that intent existed in the mind of the prisoner at the time of the offence, or whether it is sufficient that it would have been a case of murder if death had ensued; however, if it be necessary that the jury should be satisfied of the intent, I have no doubt that the circumstance, that it would have been a case of murder if death had ensued, would be of itself a good ground from which the jury might infer the intent, as everyone must be taken to intend the necessary consequences of his own acts. In the present case, I think you may dismiss the first count from your consideration, as it would be very difficult to say, that if Mr. V. had died, this would have been a case of murder.’ (m)

Upon an indictment for feloniously wounding with intent to murder, disable, &c., it appeared that the prisoner, being confined in Abingdon Gaol, pretended that he wanted some water, and, as soon as the turnkey brought him the water, the prisoner knocked him down by a blow on the head with a towel-roller, and thereby wounded him. He did this in order to effect his escape. In summing up, Maule, J., said: ‘If the prisoner had killed this man it would have been murder, whether he intended to kill him or not; but I think that there is hardly evidence here to support the charge of an intent to murder. A person cannot have an intent to murder, or an intent to do any other thing, without intending to commit murder, or to do that other thing. It would be a contradiction in terms if it were otherwise. You will, therefore, consider whether the prisoner had an intent to kill this man, or only an intent to disable him, or to do him some grievous bodily harm.’ (n)

So where upon an indictment for attempting to suffocate and strangle with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner had put a bed over his wife, and pressed it down upon her, and murder, such intent must exist in the prisoner’s mind at the time of the act done.

The intent to murder must exist in the mind at the time the wound is inflicted.

put a rope round her neck with a running noose on it, by which she was nearly prevented from breathing; Maule, J., told the jury, that in many cases a party might be guilty of murder if he caused the death by an illegal act, although at the time he did not actually intend to kill, and that in this case the prisoner would have been guilty of murder if his wife had died; but upon this indictment the jury must be satisfied that at the time the prisoner did the acts in question, he did intend to murder his wife. (o) And in a later case, Coleridge, J., told the jury that the words 'with intent to commit murder,' meant with intent to kill under such circumstances as would amount to the crime of murder, if death ensued. In judging of the intent, the questions are, whether the instrument was likely to cause death, and, if not, whether it was so used as to be likely to cause death.

Upon an indictment for wounding with intent to murder, &c., it appeared that the prosecutor had given evidence against some wood-stealers, with whom the prisoner was intimate; the prisoner struck him with a tin can four times on the head, knocked him about, and said he would break his neck; and there were two cuts on the prosecutor's scalp which laid his skull bare. Alderson, B., in summing up, said: 'You will have to consider in this case whether, if death had ensued, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder; and in giving your judgment on that question, you will have to consider, whether the instrument employed was, in its ordinary use, likely to cause death; or though an instrument unlikely, under ordinary circumstances, to cause death, whether it was used in such an extraordinary manner as to make it likely to cause death, either by continued blows or otherwise. A tin can, in its ordinary use, was not likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm; but, if the prisoner struck the prosecutor repeated blows on the head with it, you will say whether he did this merely to hurt the prosecutor and give him pain, as by giving him a black eye or a bloody nose, or whether he did it to do him some substantial grievous bodily harm. The former enactments on this subject were confined to cutting instruments, and perhaps wisely; but now the matter is much more vague, and cases ought therefore to be watched carefully. When a deadly weapon, such as a knife, a sword, or gun, is used, the intent of the party is manifest; but with an instrument like the present, you must consider whether the mode in which it was used satisfactorily shows that the prisoner intended to inflict some serious or grievous bodily harm with it.' (q)

If a party administers a noxious drug, likely to occasion death, being indifferent whether it occasion death or not, such party must be taken to contemplate the probable results of his act.

Upon an indictment for administering opium with intent to commit murder, it appeared that the prosecutrix had been left in charge of her master's house, and going out into the yard at night the prisoners threw her down, and said they would kill her if she did not swallow some stuff out of a phial which they held to her mouth, and which stuff the evidence tended to prove was a preparation of opium. She struggled, but was compelled to swallow it; they then tied her apron tight over her face, and left her lying on her back in the yard. She was afterwards found almost insensible and very ill: by proper treatment she recovered in a few days; but there was reason to conclude, that had she remained much longer undiscovered, her life would have been in very great peril. When her master returned he found the house robbed. For the prosecution it was contended, that if the main object of the prisoners was to steal from the house, and in order to effect that they committed an act in itself unlawful, they must be taken to have intended all the consequences likely to result from such act, and death was one of those consequences: it was immaterial which was the principal and which the subordinate intent. Coltman, J., told the jury that 'it would undoubtedly appear probable that one intention of the prisoners was to rob the house; but they might have had that intention and also another, namely, to destroy life; and if a noxious drug is administered, which is likely to occasion death, and the party administering it is indifferent whether it occasion death or not, that party must be looked upon as contemplating the probable results of his own action.' (r)

Firing a gun into a room of A. B.'s house, with intent to shoot A. B., whom the prisoner supposes to be in the room, did not support a charge of shooting at A. B. under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, if A. B. were not shown to be in the room or within reach of the shot. Upon an indictment for maliciously shooting at G. C., it appeared that the prisoner fired into a room of C.'s house where he supposed C. was; C., however, was in another part of the house, where he could not by possibility be reached by the shot: upon this Gurney, B., asked whether the indictment could be supported? A man could scarcely be said to be shot at, who was not near the place where the gun was fired. Rex v. Bailey (s) was cited for the prosecution, where on an indictment for shooting at H. T., who was wounded with grape-shot out of a gun fired at a ship in which he was, Lord Eldon told the jury that he was of opinion, that if they thought the guns were fired at the vessel, and those on board her generally, that the guns might be considered as shot at each individual on board her, and therefore at H. T., the person named in the indictment: Gurney, B., 'That case is perfectly distinguishable from the present; cannon-shot fired into a ship more or less endangers every individual in it; every part of the ship may be penetrated by cannon-shot; but that cannot be said of shot fired from a gun into a room where it is proved no individual then was.' (t)

Where on an indictment for shooting at the prosecutor with intent to maim, &c., it appeared that the prisoner had at various times been annoyed by night by idle persons attempting to frighten him, and the prosecutor, returning home by night, passed near the prisoner's house with a lantern; the prisoner seeing the light, thought that his nightly visitors had again appeared, reached his gun, and fired in the direction of the light, and wounded the prosecutor in the face: Patteson, J., thought that the facts would hardly bear out the charge in the indictment. (u)

Firing a gun into a room with intent to shoot A. B., who is not in the room, or in any place where the shot can reach him, is not sufficient.

Shooting at a light.

The prisoner was convicted of an assault. A question was raised in Reg. v. Turner, 2 M. & Rob. 213, whether the facts showed an intent to maim the prosecutor; but Patteson, J., expressed no opinion on it.

Boiling water was 'destructive matter' within the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 5.

The prisoner was indicted for maliciously throwing upon P. C. 'certain destructive matter (to wit) one quart of boiling water,' with intent, &c. The prisoner was the wife of P. C., and when he was asleep, she, under the influence of jealousy, boiled a quart of water in a coffee-pot, and poured it over his face and into one of his ears, and ran off boasting she had boiled him in his sleep. The injury was very grievous. The man was for a time deprived of sight, and had frequently lost for a time the hearing of one ear. The jury having convicted, upon a case reserved on the question whether boiling water was destructive matter within the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 5, the Judges held that the conviction was right. (v)

Bodily injury dangerous to life.

Upon an indictment on the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2, for causing a bodily injury dangerous to life, it appeared that the prisoner left her infant on a cold wet day lying in an open field, intending that it should die, and it was found there after some hours nearly dead from the effects of such exposure, there being congestion of the lungs and heart caused thereby, which would have been in a short time fatal if relief had not been given. At the time when the prisoner left the child she had not caused any bodily injury to it, and in a few hours after it was found it was restored by care, and then there remained no bodily injury to the lungs, heart, or otherwise; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that there was no bodily injury caused within the meaning of the clause. All that was produced was a mere functional derangement. Congestion is the mere filling the lungs and heart with more blood than there ought to be there. All the other offences created by the clause are cases of bodily injury to the structure of the body, but here the condition of the child's organs was not attended with any lesion. (w)

Injuries by jumping out of a window.

On an indictment for causing a bodily injury dangerous to life, by casting the prosecutrix out of a window upon the ground, she stated that she fell out of the window accidentally; that the prisoner beat her with his fists, and was about to inflict other injuries upon her, when she went to the window to call for assistance, and fell out of it on to the ground. In opening the case, it was stated that the evidence would be conflicting, whether the prosecutrix was thrown or jumped out of the window, but that it would be immaterial, for if the prisoner, by his violence, compelled her to throw herself out, he would be guilty. Alderson, B.: 'I do not think it will be sufficient to prove that she jumped from the window to escape from his violence. You must go farther than that, and satisfy the jury that he intended at the time to make her jump out.' (x)

If several are out for the purpose of committing a felony, and upon an alarm run different ways, and one of them maim a pursuer to avoid being taken, the others are not to be considered principals to such act. The two prisoners, White and Richardson, were breaking into a house in the lower division of Lamb's Conduit-street; but, upon alarm and pursuit, Richardson ran into Ormond-street, and White towards the Foundling. Randall seized White just by the house which they were breaking into, and White cut him with an iron crow. Graham, B., told the jury, that if the prisoners came with the same illegal purpose, and both determined to resist, the act of one would fix guilt on both; and that it might be part of the plan to take different ways to divide the force against them. The jury found both the prisoners guilty: but the Judges thought that the conviction as to Richardson was wrong. (y)

But where a party is present, aiding, &c., it is not necessary that his should be the hand by which the mischief is inflicted. The first three counts of an indictment alleged, in the usual form, that J. T. did shoot at A. B., and went on to state that M. and N. were present aiding and abetting; the second and third counts varying from the first only in the allegations of the intent: the three last counts (varying in like manner as to the intent) stated, that an unknown person shot at A. B., and that the said J. T. and M. and N. were present aiding and abetting the said unknown person the felony aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit, but did not charge them with being feloniously present, &c. The jury found J. T. guilty; but stated, in answer to a question put to them, that they did not find that J. T. was the man who fired at A. B. Upon which an objection was taken in arrest of judgment, that the three last counts were defective, on account of the omission of the word feloniously; and that no judgment could be entered on the three first counts, as the jury had negatived that J. T. was the man who fired. The learned Judge overruled the objection, which he considered as founded upon a supposed difference in the act of shooting, &c., and being present, &c., at the act: whereas the statute had made no such distinction. And he held the plain meaning and necessary construction of the statute to be, that if parties are present, &c., knowing, &c., the charge of feloniously shooting applies to everyone of them. And upon a case reserved, the Judges were all of opinion that the conviction was right. (z)

Principal in the second degree.

It has been suggested, that where an ineffectual exchange of shots took place in a deliberate duel, both the parties might be guilty of the offence of maliciously shooting within the 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, and the seconds be also guilty as principals in the second degree: but this is mentioned as not having been anywhere expressly decided. (a)

Shooting in a duel.

An indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, must have stated that the prisoner 'unlawfully cut,' &c., and it was not sufficient to allege that the prisoner feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously cut, &c. An indictment for maliciously wounding, charged that the act was done 'feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously;' it was objected in arrest of judgment that the indictment was bad, as it did not allege the act to have been done 'unlawfully and maliciously,'

(a) 3 Chit. Crim. L. 848, note (w). As it is now immaterial whether, in case death had ensued, the crime would have been murder or manslaughter under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 18, it should seem that the shooting or attempting to shoot in all cases of duels is punishable under that section; and it is presumed that it was on this ground that the indictment was preferred against the Earl of Cardigan, under the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 4. See Reg. v. Douglas, C. & M. 193, a similar indictment against another person engaged in the same duel.

For administering it must state the thing to be poisonous or destructive.

A bodily injury dangerous to life need not be specified.

The words 'dangerous to life' did not override the words 'cut, stab, or wound,' in the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2.

The means by which a wound is inflicted and, upon a case reserved, the Judges held unanimously that the judgment ought to be arrested. (b) An indictment for administering a poisonous or destructive thing, must aver that the thing administered was poisonous or destructive. The prisoner was indicted for having mixed a quantity of sponge, cut into small pieces, with milk, and given it to her husband, with intent to poison him; it was objected that the indictment was bad, as it did not state that the sponge was of a deleterious or poisonous nature, and Alderson, B., held that the objection was good. (c) An indictment under the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2, for causing to a person a bodily injury dangerous to life, need not specify the injury. An indictment charged that the prisoner feloniously did assault C. H., and that he did cause unto the said C. H. a certain bodily injury dangerous to life, by striking and beating her with his hands and fists on her head and back, by kicking her on the back, by seizing and lifting her, and striking her head against a wooden beam of a ceiling, by casting, throwing and flinging her against a brick floor, with intent to murder her. It was proposed to demur to this indictment, on the ground that the nature of the bodily injury dangerous to life should have been stated with certainty. Patteson, J., thought the point well deserving of consideration, but suggested that the prisoner should plead, he reserving to him the same benefit as if he had demurred: which was done, and after a learned argument upon a case reserved, the Judges held the indictment sufficient. (d)

Where an indictment on the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2, alleged that the prisoner discharged a gun loaded with gunpowder and ball at S. D., and with the ball so shot forth 'feloniously did strike, penetrate, and wound' the said S. D. upon the thigh, with intent to murder him; it was objected that the indictment was bad, because it did not allege that the wound was dangerous to life; but it was held that this averment was not necessary, and that it was as obvious, from the plain intent as from the grammatical construction of the section, that to stab, cut, or wound with intent to murder, though the stabbing, cutting, or wounding were not dangerous to life, was an offence under that section. (e)

The instrument or means by which the wound is inflicted need not be stated in the indictment, and, if they are stated, the prose-

(c) Rex v. Powles, 4 C. & P. 571. The case was decided on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, the words 'any poison or other destructive thing,' in that Act are also in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 11, 14.

(d) Reg. v. Cruise, 2 Moo. C. C. R. 53. S. C. 8 C. & P. 541. It was necessary to take the objection by demurrer, or to get the point reserved as if it had been taken on demurrer, for after verdict the objection would not have availed, as the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 21, makes an indictment good after verdict, 'if it describe the offence in the words of the statute.' See as to this, Reg. v. Martin, 8 A. & E. 481. 3 N. & P. 472. The means of inflicting the injury are stated in this indictment, but it should seem that it was not necessary to state them. See Rex v. Briggs, infra, note (f).

(e) Shea v. Legg, 3 Cox C. C. 141. The Court said that the same point had been held in Fegarty v. R-g, 2 Cox C. C. 105; but the report does not mention any such point. There a court stated that the prisoner wilfully, maliciously, unlawfully, and feloniously, by certain means therein set out, caused to M. D. a certain bodily injury, dangerous to life, 'to wit, by then and there shooting, &c. [setting out the means] at the person of the said M. D.,' and it was objected that the acts alleged as the means whereby the wound was inflicted were not averred to have been done feloniously; but the Court overruled the objection.

entor is not bound to prove a wound by such means. On an indictment which charges a wound to have been inflicted by striking with a stick, and kicking with the feet, proof that the wound was caused either by a blow from a stick, or a kick, will be sufficient, though it be uncertain by which of the two it was caused. Upon an indictment under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 12, for wounding with a stick and with the feet, it appeared that one of the prisoners struck the prosecutor with a hedge-stake, or half rail, on the head, and knocked him off his horse, and two other persons struck him with their fists, and kicked him over the head and body, so that he became senseless. He received a cut on the month, and a severe contused wound on the crown of the head. The medical witnesses were of opinion that the wound, from its position, could not have been caused by a fall from horseback, and that it was occasioned either by a blow from a stick, or a kick of a heavy shoe, when the prosecutor was on the ground. The jury found the prisoners guilty, but said they could not tell whether the wound was caused by a blow of the stick, or a kick with the shoe. It was objected that a wound given by the foot, with a shoe on it, was not within the Act; and, if it was, the mode of wounding was not properly described in the indictment, which stated it to have been done with the feet only. But upon a case reserved, the Judges unanimously held that the means by which the wound was inflicted need not have been stated; that it was mere surplusage to state them; and that the statement did not confine the crown to the means stated, but might be rejected as surplusage, and that whether the wound was from a blow with a stick, or a kick from a shoe, the indictment was equally supported. (f) need not be stated, and if stated, need not be proved as laid.

Where an indictment simply alleged that the prisoner attempted to discharge a loaded gun, and it was objected that it was bad for not describing the materials with which it was loaded; Platt, B., held that it was sufficient. (g) And where an indictment alleged that the prisoner 'by feloniously drawing the trigger of a certain pistol loaded with gunpowder and a leaden bullet, then and there feloniously did attempt to discharge the said pistol' at J. H., with intent to murder him; it was objected that the words 'the said pistol' did not incorporate the previous description: Rolfe, B., 'The indictment is sufficient. It avers that the prisoner, by pulling the trigger of the pistol, attempted to discharge the said pistol, and surely that must mean that he attempted to discharge its contents.' (h)

Averments as to loaded arms.

An indictment for maliciously shooting may, in one set of counts, lay the shooting at one person, with intent to murder that person, and in another set of counts, the shooting at another person, with intent to murder such other person. One set of counts of an indictment alleged, that the prisoner shot at Hill, with intent to murder, &c. Hill, another set of counts that he shot at Lee, with intent to murder, &c. Lee. It was objected that the indictment must be quashed, as it charged two distinct felonies. Littledale, J.: 'It seems to me that these counts may well be Joinder of counts with different intents.

(f) Rex v. Briggs, R. & M. C. C. R. 318. In Erle's case, 2 Lew. 133, Coleridge, J., also decided that an indictment upon the 1 Vict. c. 85, need not state the joined. It is all one act, though differently charged. It is like the case of forgery, where different intents are laid; here there is one act of shooting charged, with several different intents. (i) And where such counts are so joined, the prosecutor will not be compelled to elect on which he will proceed. The prisoner fired a gun in the direction of a man and his wife, and one count charged the intent to be to kill the wife, and the other to kill the husband, it was held that it was not a case in which the prosecutor ought to be put to his election, inasmuch as it was one and the same transaction, upon which both the counts were framed. (k) An indictment under the 1 Vict. c. 85, for maliciously cutting and wounding, might contain counts framed on sec. 2, with intent to murder, and also counts framed on sec. 4, with intent to maim, disable, and do grievous bodily harm. (l)

Where the first count charged the prisoner with attempting to administer to Margaret Murphy oxalic acid with intent to murder her; the second count charged the prisoner with mixing oxalic acid in tea, which Margaret Murphy had prepared to be drunk by her, and that the prisoner thereby attempted to administer the oxalic acid to Margaret Murphy with intent to murder her; the third count varied the means, but was otherwise like the second; the fourth count charged the prisoner with attempting to administer to 'a certain other person, to wit, Margaret Murphy, poison, with intent to commit the crime of murder; the fifth count charged the prisoner with putting poison into the teapot, and thereby attempting to administer poison to James Murphy, with intent to poison him; the sixth count charged the prisoner with attempting to administer poison to James Murphy, with intent to commit the crime of murder; it was urged that this indictment should be quashed, as it charged the commission of several distinct felonies; and that, though the act which endangered life might be only one, yet the separate intents alleged, rendered the charge in this indictment one of three distinct felonies. It was answered that it might be that the prisoner had put poison in a teapot where two persons were going to breakfast, and that there might be no evidence of previous malice against either; a failure of justice might ensue if the counts could not be joined; and it was every day's practice to charge an act with several different intents in the same indictment. Gurney, B., having read the depositions, ordered the case to stand over till the next assizes, when the prosecutor might decide whether he would stand upon the present indictment, or prefer another indictment or indictments. the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment, then and in every such case the jury may acquit the defendant of such felony, and find him guilty of unlawfully cutting, stabbing, or wounding, and thereupon the defendant shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for the misdemeanor of cutting, stabbing, or wounding.

Where some counts charged the defendant with an assault on S. G., and with having thereby unlawfully and maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm upon him, and another count was for a common assault, it appeared that the defendant handed the prosecutor a letter, and asked him to read it, which he declined to do; the defendant then struck the prosecutor with his fists two violent blows on the mouth, another on the temple, and a fourth on the back of the ear; three of his front teeth, and other teeth farther up were loosened; his gums were lacerated, and the mouth was swollen. The pain which was suffered immediately afterwards was insufferable; one of the front teeth and the back teeth had since partially fastened, but the two front teeth had not, and the prosecutor must lose them. The prosecutor had suffered much otherwise for a long time. The jury were told that the injuries inflicted fell within the definition of 'grievous bodily harm,' and that if they believed the witnesses, there was evidence to support the first counts; and that the question of whether the defendant intended to inflict grievous bodily harm did not arise, but that the simple point for their consideration was, 'did the defendant unlawfully assault the prosecutor, and thereby inflict upon him grievous bodily harm?' The verdict was, 'We find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, but without premeditation; it was done under the influence of passion.' It was then contended that this was a verdict of guilty upon the count for the common assault only; but a verdict of guilty was directed to be entered on the other counts, and, upon a case reserved, it was urged that the jury might have intended not to find the prisoner guilty of intending bodily harm, and that intention was a necessary ingredient in the offence, and the word 'maliciously' meant something more than 'intentionally;' but it was held that the direction was correct. The language used by the jury must be construed by looking at the subject-matter of the charge, and what was left to the jury; and this assault was intentional in the eye of the law, though committed without premeditation and under the influence of passion. (n)

Construction of the verdict with reference to the facts and summing up.

Upon an indictment against three for maliciously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, the jury may convict two of the felony charged, and the third (under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5), of unlawfully wounding. (o)

Different verdict as to different prisoners.

Where one count charged the defendant with maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm; and another with assaulting, beating, wounding, and ill-treating, and thereby occasioning actual bodily harm; and the jury found the defendant guilty of a common assault; it was held that this conviction was good upon the second count. (p) And so where one count was for inflicting grievous bodily harm, another for unlawfully wounding, and the third for an assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty of a common assault, it was held that the verdict was perfectly legal, and that the Court was bound to receive it. CHAPTER THE TENTH.

OF COMMON AND AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS.

Of Common Assaults.

AN assault is an attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do a corporal hurt to another; as by striking at another with a stick or other weapon, or without a weapon, though the party striking misses his aim. So drawing a sword or bayonet, or even holding up a fist in a menacing manner, throwing a bottle or glass with intent to wound or strike, presenting a gun at a person who is within the distance to which the gun will carry, pointing a pitchfork at a person who is within reach, or any other similar act, accompanied with such circumstances as denote at the time an intention, coupled with a present ability, of using actual violence against the person of another, will amount to an assault. (a)

an assault.

But it appears to be now quite settled, though many ancient opinions were to the contrary, that no words whatsoever, be they ever so provoking, can amount to an assault. (b) And the words used at the time may so explain the intention of the party as to qualify his act, and prevent it from being deemed an assault; as where A. laid his hand upon his sword, and said, 'If it were not the assize-time, I would not take such language from you,' it was holden not to be an assault, on the ground that he did not design to do the other party any corporal hurt at that time, and that a man's intention must operate with his act in constituting an assault. (c)

No words will amount to an assault.

It has been laid down by a very learned Judge, notwithstanding a contrary opinion in an earlier case, (d) that if a person present a pistol, purporting to be a loaded pistol, so near as to produce danger to life if the pistol had gone off, it is an assault in point of law, although in fact the pistol be unloaded. The learned Judge said, 'My idea is, that it is an assault to present a pistol at all, whether loaded or not. If you threw the powder out of the pan, or took the percussion cap off, and said to the party this is an empty pistol, then that would be no assault, for there the party must see that it was not possible that he should be injured; but if a person presents a pistol which has the appearance of being loaded, and puts the party into fear and alarm, that is what it is the object of the law to prevent.' (e)

However, where in an action for an assault and presenting a loaded pistol at the plaintiff, it appeared that the defendant cocked a pistol, and presented it at the plaintiff's head, and said, if he was not quiet he would blow his brains out; but there was no evidence that the pistol was loaded; Lord Abinger, C. B., held, that if the pistol was not loaded it would be no assault. (f) And Tindal, C. J., has ruled in the same way. (g)

Pointing a loaded gun at half cock at a person is an assault; for there is a present ability of doing the act threatened, as the gun can be cocked in an instant. (h)

Present ability to effect the threat.

It is not every threat, where there is no actual personal violence, that constitutes an assault; there must, in all cases, be the means of carrying the threat into effect. If, therefore, a party be advancing in a threatening attitude, e. g., with his fist clenched, to strike another, so that his blow would almost immediately have reached such person, and be then stopped, it is an assault in law, if his intent were to strike such person, though he was not near enough at the time to have struck him. (i)

Where the plaintiff was in the defendant's workshop and refused to leave it, and the defendant and his workmen surrounded him, and tucking up their sleeves and aprons, threatened to break his neck, if he did not go out, and fearing that the men would strike him if he did not do so, the plaintiff went out; it was held that this was an assault; for there was a threat of violence exhibiting an intention to assault, and a present ability to carry the threat into execution. (k)

The plaintiff was walking on a footpath by a road side, and the defendant, who was on horseback, rode after him at a quick pace; the plaintiff then ran away into his own garden, and the defendant rode up to the gate, and shook his whip at the plaintiff, who was about three yards off; it was held, that if the defendant rode after the plaintiff, so as to compel him to run into his garden for shelter to avoid being beaten, it was an assault. (l)

Of a battery.

A battery is more than an attempt to do a corporal hurt to another; but any injury whatsoever, be it ever so small, being actually done to the person of a man, in an angry or revengeful, or rude or insolent manner, such as spitting in his face, or in any

(e) Reg. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 483. Parke, B.; for the facts of this case see ante, p. 982.

(f) Blake v. Barnard, 9 C. & P. 626. It seems that a very reasonable distinction might be made in cases of this kind. If a person presents a gun at another, knowing it not to be loaded, there can be no intent to injure in any event, and therefore he ought not to be criminally responsible; but if the person, at whom such an unloaded gun was presented, did anything in self-defence, his justification, whether in a civil or criminal proceeding, ought to be just the same as if the gun were loaded; for the act of the party presenting the gun led to the natural consequence that the party at whom it was presented should defend himself, and the party presenting the gun ought not to be permitted to show the facts to be otherwise than he had himself held them out to be.

(g) Reg. v. James, 1 C. & K. 530; and see Reg. v. Baker, 1 C. & K. 254, where Roeb. B. seems also to have held the same opinion.

way touching him in anger, or violently jostling him out of the way, is a battery in the eye of the law. (m) For the law cannot draw the line between different degrees of violence, and, therefore, totally prohibits the first and lowest stage of it; every man's person being sacred, and no other having a right to meddle with it in any the slightest manner. (n) It should be observed that every battery includes an assault. (o)

To cut a man's clothes whilst on his person is an assault, although there is no intention to inflict any bodily injury, and in the ordinary case of a blow on the back there is clearly an assault, though the blow is received by the coat on the person. (p)

Where a policeman was stationed at a door to prevent a person from entering, it was held that, if he was entirely passive, like a door or a wall put to prevent that person from entering the room, and simply obstructing the entrance of that person, no assault was committed. (q)

The injury need not be effected directly by the hand of the party. Thus there may be an assault by encouraging a dog to bite; by riding over a person with a horse; or by wilfully and violently driving a cart, &c. against the carriage of another person, and thereby causing bodily injury to the persons travelling in it. (r) And it seems that it is not necessary that the assault should be immediate; as where a defendant threw a lighted squib into a market-place, which, being tossed from hand to hand by different persons, at last hit the plaintiff in the face, and put out his eye, it was adjudged that this was actionable as an assault and battery. (s) And the same has been holden where a person pushed a drunken man against another, and thereby hurt him; (t) but if such person intended doing a right act, as to assist the drunken man, or to prevent him from going along the street without help, and in so doing a hurt ensued, he would not be answerable. (u)

Where a defendant put some cantharides into some coffee, in order that a female might take it, and she did take it, and was made ill by it, it was held to be an assault. (v) But this case has been overruled. (w)

There may be an assault also by exposing a person to the inclemency of the weather. Thus, in a case where an indictment against a mistress for not providing sufficient food and sustenance for a female servant, whereby the servant became sick and emaciated, was ruled to be bad, because it did not allege that the servant was of tender years, and under the dominion and control of her mistress; it was suggested that the indictment also charged that the defendant exposed the servant to the inclemency of the weather; and it was holden that such exposure was an act in the nature of an assault, for which the defendant might be liable, whatever was the age of the servant. (x)

young

Where a mother left her child, ten days old, at the bottom of a dry ditch, by which there was a path, and a lane separated from the ditch by a hedge; Parke, B., is reported to have said that 'there were no marks of violence on the child, and it does not appear in the result that the child actually experienced any inconvenience, as it was providentially found soon after it was exposed, and therefore, although it is said in some of the books that an exposure to the inclemency of the weather may amount to an assault, yet, if that be so at all, it can only be when the person suffers a hurt or injury of some kind or other from the exposure.' (y) But where the defendants told the mother of a child of which she had been delivered that it was to be taken to a nursery or institution to be brought up, and they put the child in a bag and hung it upon some park-pales at the side of a footpath, and it was likely that the putting a child of so tender an age into a bag and hanging the bag on the pales would cause its death; Tindal, C. J., held that the defendants were guilty of an assault; for the mother gave consent on the pretext that the child was to be taken to some institution, and as that pretext was false, it was no consent at all. (z)

But if one has an idiot brother, who is bedridden in his house, and he keeps him in a dark room, without sufficient warmth or clothing, this is not an assault or imprisonment, as it is an omission without a duty, which will not create an indictable offence. (a) Where parish officers, by force and against her consent, cut off the hair of a young woman who was an inmate of a workhouse, it was held an assault. (b)

Assault by indecent liberties with females.

If a master take indecent liberties with a female scholar without her consent, he is liable to be punished for an assault, though she did not resist. A master took very indecent liberties with a female scholar of the age of thirteen, by putting her hand into his breeches, pulling up her petticoats, and putting his private parts to hers; she did not resist, but it was against her will. The jury

The counsel for the prosecution admitted that they could not prove this charge in the indictment to any extent; and the defendant was accordingly acquitted. That negligence and harsh usage may be a means of committing murder, see ante, p. 677.

(y) Reg. v. Renshaw, 2 Cox C. C. 285. Parke, B., ante, p. 91.

(z) Reg. v. March, 1 C. & K. 496. The very learned C. J. cautiously avoided saying that it would not have been an assault if the mother had consented to all that had been done; and as it is clear that a mother may be guilty of a battery on a child by actual striking, quare whether, when she does or consents to an unlawful handling or disposition of her child, she is not guilty of a battery; for what is a battery but an unlawful touching of the person of another? Reg. v. Renshaw, therefore, seems open to doubt on this ground; and also on the further ground that it seems to make the question, whether the act of the prisoner was a battery or not, depend on the result of that act; whereas, it is conceived that that act was either a battery or not a battery at the moment it was committed. It is confidently submitted that the instant a mother deposits a child with intent to abandon it, as that is an unlawful act, which she can neither justify nor excuse, she is guilty of a battery.

found him guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, and also of a common assault; and the Judges thought the finding as to the latter clearly right. (c) And making a female patient strip naked, under pretence that the defendant, a medical practitioner, cannot otherwise judge of her illness, if he himself takes off her clothes, is an assault. A girl of sixteen was taken by her parents to the defendant, a German quack, on account of fits, by which she was afflicted; he said he would cure her, and bid her come again the next morning; she went accordingly the next morning by herself, and he told her she must strip naked; she said she would not. He said she must, or he could not do any good. She began to untie her dress, and he stripped off all her clothes; she did nothing; he pulled off everything; she told him she did not like to be stripped in that manner. When she was naked, he rubbed her with a liquid. The case was left to the jury to consider whether the defendant believed that stripping the girl would assist his judgment, or whether he did not strip her wantonly, without thinking it necessary; and they were told that the making her strip and pulling off her clothes might, under the latter circumstances, justify a verdict for an assault. The jury found the defendant guilty; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. (d)

Where a prize or other fight takes place, and a number of persons are assembled to witness it, if they have gone thither for the purpose of seeing the combatants strike each other, and were present when they did so, they are all in point of law guilty of an assault; and there is no distinction between those who concur in the act and those who fight; (e) and it is not at all material which party struck the first blow, for if several are in concert, encouraging one another and co-operating, they are all equally guilty, though one only committed the actual assault. (f)

Persons present at a prize fight.

Where an act is done with the consent of a party it is not an assault; for in order to support a charge of assault such an assault must be proved as could not be justified if an action were brought for it, and leave and license pleaded; attempting, therefore, to have connection with a girl between the ages of ten and twelve, or under ten years of age, if done with the girl's consent, is not an assault. (g)

But if resistance be prevented by fraud it is an assault. If a man, therefore, have connection with a married woman, under pretence of being her husband, he is guilty of an assault. (h)

tion given to the individual by action, the law also demands public vengeance, as it is a breach of the King's peace, a loss which the state sustains by the confinement of one of its members, and an infringement of the good order of society. (i) To constitute the injury of false imprisonment, there must be an unlawful detention of the person. With respect to the detention, it may be laid down that every confinement of the person, whether it be in a common prison or in a private house, or by a forcible detaining in the public streets, will be sufficient. (k) And such detention will be unlawful unless there be some sufficient authority for it, arising either from some process from the courts of justice, or from some warrant of a legal officer, having power to commit under his hand and seal, and expressing the cause of such commitment; or arising from some other special cause sanctioned, for the necessity of the thing, either by common law or by Act of Parliament. (l) And the detention will be unlawful, though the warrant or process upon which it is made be regular, in case they are executed at an unlawful time, as on a Sunday; or in a place privileged from arrests, as in the verge of the King's Court. (m) Especial provision is made concerning the arrest of foreign ambassadors, or other foreign public ministers, and their domestics, or domestic servants, by the statute 7 Anne, c. 12, which makes any process against them, or their goods and chattels, altogether void; and provides, that the persons prosecuting, soliciting, or executing, such process, shall be deemed violators of the law of nations, and disturbers of the public repose; and shall suffer such penalties and corporal punishment, as the Lord Chancellor and the two Chief Justices, or any two of them, shall think fit. But no trader within the description of the bankrupt laws, who shall be in the service of any ambassador or public minister, is to be privileged or protected by this Act; nor is anyone to be punished for arresting an ambassador's servant, unless the name of such servant be registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state,

(k) 2 Inst. 589. Com. Dig. tit. 'Imprisonment' (G). 3 Blac. Com. 127. In Bird v. Jones, 7 Q. B. 742, the majority of the Court held that where the plaintiff in attempting to go in a particular direction was prevented from going in any direction but one, not being that in which he endeavoured to pass, it was not an imprisonment, and this, whether the plaintiff had or had not a right to pass in the first-mentioned direction. 'A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only; it may be moveable or fixed; but a boundary it must have; and that boundary the party imprisoned must be prevented from passing; he must be prevented from leaving that place, within the ambit of which the party imprisoning him would confine him, except by person breach.' Per Coleridge, J., and 'In general, if one man compels another to stay in any given place against his will, he imprisons that other just as much as if he locked him up in a room; and it is not necessary in order to constitute an imprisonment that a man's person should be touched. The compelling a man to go in a given direction against his will may amount to imprisonment.' 'Imprisonment is a total restraint of the person for however short a time, and not a partial obstruction of his will, whatever inconvenience it may bring on him.' and by him transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, or their undersheriffs or deputies. (n)

It has been supposed that every imprisonment includes a battery: (o) but this doctrine was denied in a recent case, where it was said by the Court that it was absurd to contend that every imprisonment included a battery. (p)

Every imprisonment does not include a battery.

Whether the act shall amount to an assault must, in every case, be collected from the intention. Thus, in an action for an assault, where it appeared that the defendant and another person were fighting, when the plaintiff came up and took hold of the defendant by the collar, in order to separate the combatants, upon which the defendant beat the plaintiff, it was objected to the counsel for the plaintiff, who offered to enter into this evidence, that it ought to have been specially stated in the replication to the plea of son assault demesne: but the objection was overruled, on the ground that the evidence was not offered by way of justification, but for the purpose of showing that there was not any assault, and that it was the quo animo which constituted an assault, which was matter to be left to the jury. (q) So to lay one's hand gently on another whom an officer has a warrant to arrest, and to tell the officer that this is the man he wants, is said to be no battery. (r) So if one lays his hand gently, and not in a hostile manner, on another, in order to attract his attention, it is not an assault. (s) And if the injury committed were accidental and undesigned, it will not amount to a battery. Thus, if one soldier hurts another by discharging a gun in exercise, it will not be a battery. (t) And it is no battery if, by a sudden fright, a horse runs away with his rider, and runs against a man. (u) So where upon an indictment for throwing down skins into a man's yard, being a public way, by which a person's eye was beaten out, it appeared by the evidence that the wind blew the skin out of the way, and that the injury was caused by this circumstance, the defendants were acquitted. (v) It seems also that if two, by consent, play at cudgels, and one happen to hurt the other, it would not amount to a battery, as their intent was lawful and commendable, in promoting courage and activity. (w)

The intention with which the act is done is material in the inquiry whether it will amount to an assault.

Cases where the force used may be justified, and will not amount to an assault.

In some cases force used against the person of another may be justified, and will not amount to an assault and battery. Thus, if an officer having a warrant against one who will not suffer himself to be arrested, beat or wound him, in the attempt to take him; or if a parent, in a reasonable manner, chastise his child; or a master his servant, being actually in his service at the time; or a schoolmaster his scholar; or a gaoler his prisoner; or if one confine a friend who is mad, and bind and beat him, &c., in such a manner as is proper in such circumstances; or if a man force a sword from one who offers to kill another therewith; or if a man gently lay his hands upon another, and thereby stay him from inciting a dog against a third person; no assault or battery will be committed by such acts. (y) So if A. beat B. (without wounding him, or throwing at him a dangerous weapon), who is wrongfully endeavouring, with violence, to dispossess him of his lands, or of the goods, either of himself or of any other person, which have been delivered to him to be kept, and will not desist upon A.'s laying his hands gently upon him, and disturbing him; or if a man beat, wound, or maim one who is making an assault upon his own person, or that of his wife, parent, child, or master; or if a man fight with, or beat, one who attempts to kill any stranger; in these cases also it seems that the party may justify the assault and battery. (z) It has been holden that a master may not justify an assault in defence of his servant, because he might have an action for the loss of his service; (a) but a different opinion has been entertained on this point; (b) and in one case Lord Mansfield said, 'I cannot say that a master interposing, when his servant is assaulted, is not justifiable under the circumstances of the case; as well as a servant interposing for his master; it rests on the relation between master and servant.' (c) It is said that a servant may not justify beating another in defence of his master's son, though he were Ollerton*, Combs 218, is also referred to as an authority, that if one license another to beat him, such license is no defence, because it is against the peace. And see ante, p. 854, et seq. as to the criminality of some games or sports.

(x) James v. Campbell, 5 C. & P. 372, Bosanquet, J. As the blow, if it had struck the party at whom it was aimed, would have been a battery, so it was though it struck another person; just in the same way as if a blow intended for A. hit and kill B., it will be murder or manslaughter, according as it would have been murder or manslaughter, if the blow had hit A. and killed him. C. S. G. In Hall v. Fearney, 3 Q. B. 919, it was held that inevitable accident arising from superior agency is a defence under the general issue; but that a defence which admits that the accident resulted from an act of the defendant must be pleaded. In an action for assault, where the defendant had thrown a stick and hit the plaintiff, but it did not appear that he threw the stick with the intention of hitting the plaintiff; Rolfe, B., is reported to have held that this was not sufficient to constitute an assault, as it did not appear for what purpose the stick was thrown; and it was therefore fair to conclude that it was thrown for a proper purpose, and that the striking of the plaintiff was merely accidental. Alderson v. Waistell, 1 C. & K. 358. But this ruling may well be doubted, at all events as far as relates to a civil suit. See ante, p. 1025, note (d).

commanded to do so by the master, because he is not a servant to the son; and that, for the like reason, a tenant may not beat another in defence of his landlord. (d) A wife may justify an assault in defence of her husband. (e) An upper servant cannot justify beating an under servant for disobedience of orders. (f)

There is no doubt that son assault demesne is a good defence to an indictment. (g) If, therefore, the plaintiff first lifted up his staff, and offered to strike the defendant, it is a sufficient assault to justify the defendant striking the plaintiff, and he need not stay till the plaintiff has actually struck him. (h) If one man strikes another a blow, that other has a right to defend himself, and to strike a blow in his defence, but he has no right to revenge himself; and if when all danger is past he strikes a blow not necessary for his defence, he commits an assault and battery. (i) It is not, however, every trifling assault that will justify a grievous and immediate mayhem, such as cutting off a leg or hand, or biting off a joint of a man's finger, unless it happened accidentally, without any cruel or malignant intention, or after the blood was heated in the scuffle, but it must appear that the assault was in some degree proportionable to the mayhem. (k) If a party raise up a hand against another, within a distance capable of the latter being struck, the other may strike in his own defence, to prevent him, but he must not use a greater degree of force than is necessary. (l) For if the violence used be more than was necessary to repel the assault, the party may be convicted of an assault. (m)

Son assault demesne.

Excess of violence.

It has been holden that a defendant may justify even a mayhem, if done by him as an officer in the army, for disobeying orders; and that he may give in evidence the sentence of a council at war, upon a petition against him by the plaintiff; and that if, by the sentence, the petition is dismissed, it will be conclusive evidence in favour of the defendant. (n)

In cases where officers have authority to arrest, their laying hands upon persons in order to do so is no battery in law. So if a justice make a warrant to J. S. to arrest J. D., and J. N. comes in aid of J. S., and gently puts his hands on the shoulders of J. D., and says, 'this is the man,' this is no battery. (o) There may be cases in which a person may justify laying hands upon another in order to serve him with civil process. (p)

But in all such cases the force used must be only so great as is necessary for the purpose of effecting the object in view, and if there be an excess of violence the officer will be guilty of an assault. If, therefore, a constable is preventing a breach of the peace, and any person stands in the way with intent to prevent him from so doing,

Officers must only use as great force as is necessary.

the constable is justified in taking such person into custody, but not in striking him. (g) So where one of the Marshals of the city of London, whose duty it was on the day of a public meeting in Guildhall, to see that a passage was kept for the transit of the carriages of the members of the corporation and others, directed a person in the front of the crowd to stand back, and on being told by him that he could not for those behind him, struck him immediately on the face, saying, that he would make him, it was held that a more moderate degree of pressure ought to have been exercised, and some little time given to remove the party in a more peaceable way, and that consequently the Marshal had been guilty of too violent an exertion of his authority. (r)

An officer is entitled to the possession of the warrant under which he acts, and if he deliver it to the party against whom it is issued, and he refuse to re-deliver it, the officer may use so much force as is necessary to get possession of it again. An officer having a warrant to search for an illegal still in the defendant's house, the defendant asked to see the warrant, and it was given him, and he then refused to return it, upon which the officer endeavoured by force to retake it, and a scuffle ensued, it was held that the officer was justified in using so much violence as was necessary to retake the warrant, and no more. (s) and coroners.

Where a magistrate is making a preliminary inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is sufficient ground to commit a party for trial, no person has a right to be present, and consequently the magistrate may justify laying hands upon a person, who refuses to leave the room where the inquiry is being made, in order to turn him out. (t) So where a coroner is holding an inquest, which is a preliminary investigation only, he may justify turning any person out of the room where the inquest is held. (u) But where the proceedings before magistrates are of a judicial nature, as in the case of summary convictions, all persons have a right to be present, and, therefore, a magistrate cannot justify laying hands upon a person to turn him out of the room. (v) Formerly on the hearing of an information, the magistrates had the discretionary power to regulate the proceedings of their own Courts, and might decide who should appear as advocates, and whether, when the parties were before them, they would hear any one but them; if, therefore, an attorney insisted upon acting as an attorney in such a case, where it was not the practice of the magistrates to permit any person to appear as an advocate, they might justify laying hands upon him to turn him out of the room. (w) But the case would be otherwise since the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 12, which gives the parties in such cases the right to the assistance of counsel or attorney. (x)

defendant cannot justify a battery without a request to depart; but it is otherwise where any actual violence is committed, as it is lawful in such case to oppose force to force: therefore, if a person break down the gate, or come into a close vi et armis, the owner need not request him to be gone, but may lay hands on him immediately; for it is but returning violence with violence. (y) If a person enters another's house with force and violence, the owner of the house may justify turning him out (using no more force than is necessary), without a previous request to depart: but if the person enters quietly, the other party cannot justify turning him out without a previous request. (z) For 'there is a manifest distinction between endeavouring to turn a man out of a house or close, into which he has previously entered quietly, and resisting a forcible attempt to enter; in the first case a request is necessary; in the latter not.' (a) So, if one come forcibly and take away another's goods, the owner may oppose him at once, for there is no time to make a request. (b) And the owner of goods (or his servant, acting by his command) which are wrongfully in the possession of another, may, after requesting him to deliver them up, justify an assault in order to repossess himself of them. (c) It seems also that a person who has a right of way or other easement may justify using so much force as may be necessary to enable him to exercise that right, or to prevent another from interrupting it. (d) But, in general, unless there be violence in the trespass, a party should not, either in defence of his person, or his real or personal property, begin by striking the trespasser, but should request him to depart or desist; and, if that is refused, should gently lay his hands upon him in the first instance, and not proceed with greater force than is made necessary by resistance. (e) Thus, where a churchwarden justified taking off the hat of a person who wore it in church, at the time of divine service, the plea stated, that he first requested the plaintiff to be uncovered, and that the plaintiff refused. (f) And in all cases where the force used is justified, as not amounting to an assault, under the particular circumstances of the case, it must appear that it was not greater than was reasonably necessary to accomplish the lawful purpose intended to be effected. (g) Therefore, though an offer to strike the defendant, first made by the prosecutor, is a must be a request to depart or desist, before force is used.

No greater force than necessary must be used.

(y) Green v. Goddard, 2 Saik. 641. In a case of this kind, however, it should seem that the violence must be considerable, and continuing, in order to justify the application of force by the owner, without some previous request to depart; at least, if the force applied be more than would be justified under a molliter manus imposuit: for in a case of assault and battery, where the defendant pleaded son assault demesne, and the plaintiff replied that he was possessed of a certain close, and that the defendant broke the gate and chased his horses in the close, and that he, for the defending his possession, molliter insultum fecit upon the defendant, the replication was adjudged to be bad; and that it should have been molliter manus imposuit, as the plaintiff could not justify an assault in sufficient assault by him to justify the defendant in striking, without waiting till the prosecutor had actually struck him first; yet, even a prior assault will not justify a battery, if such battery be extreme; and it will be matter of evidence, whether the retaliation by the defendant were excessive, and out of all proportion to the necessity or provocation received. (h)

The party injured may proceed against the defendant by action and indictment for the same assault; and the Court in which the action is brought will not compel him to make his election to pursue either the one or the other; for the fine to the King, upon the criminal prosecution, and the damages to the party in the civil action, are perfectly distinct in their natures, (i) but the Court of Queen's Bench have refused to sentence a party convicted of an assault, while an action was pending for the same assault. (k)

One indictment assaulting two persons.

It appears to have been formerly holden that a person could not be prosecuted upon one indictment for assaulting two persons, each assault being a distinct offence. (l) But the case has been subsequently treated as one which was not well considered: and the Court said, 'Cannot the King call a man to account for a breach of the peace, because he broke two heads instead of one?' (m)

Where a count charged that the defendant made an assault upon 'one Henry Bennett,' and 'him the said William Bennett did beat,' and 'other wrongs to the said William Bennett did,' the Court of Queen's Bench held that the count was good. (n)

Trial for several assaults at the same time.

As an assault is merely a misdemeanor, it is competent to the prosecutor to insert several counts in the same indictment for different assaults; and it has long been the constant practice to receive evidence of several assaults upon the same indictment; (o) for in offences inferior to felony the practice of quashing the indictment, or calling upon the prosecutor to elect on which charge he will proceed, does not exist. (p)

Indictment of two counts, one for a riot, and the other for an assault, found by the grand jury a true bill as to the assault, and ignoramus as to the riot, holden good.

Where an indictment consisted of two counts, one for riot, the other for an assault, and the grand jury only found it a true bill as to the count for an assault, and indorsed ignoramus on the count for a riot, a motion was made on the part of the prosecutor to quash it, on the ground that the grand jury should have found the whole to have been a true bill, or have rejected the indictment altogether; but the Court held, that as there were two distinct counts, the finding a true bill as to one count only, and rejecting the other, left the indictment, as to the count which the jury had affirmed, just as if there had originally been only that one count. &c., may, upon an indictment, be given in evidence under the general issue. (r)

On an indictment against two defendants for committing an assault, the prosecutor proved an assault committed by one, with which the other had nothing to do, and it was urged that the latter was entitled to be acquitted, as an assault answering the description of that in the indictment had been proved, and, as there was only one count, more than one assault could not be proved; and it was held that the latter must be acquitted. It was then objected for the other defendant, that as the count was for a joint assault, this defendant could not be convicted of an assault by him alone, and that he only came prepared to answer that joint assault; and it was held that this defendant must be acquitted. If the indictment had charged that the defendants assaulted the prosecutor, the result might have been different; but here one specific assault is mentioned, and if they cannot be convicted of that, they must be acquitted. (s) And where on an indictment containing one count for an assault against two persons, an assault by one was proved, in which the other was not at all implicated, it was held that one assault to which the indictment was applicable having been proved, evidence of other assaults could not be gone into. (t)

As every battery includes an assault, (u) it follows, that on an indictment of assault and battery, in which the assault is ill laid, if the defendant be found guilty of the battery it is sufficient. (v)

Verdict of guilty of the battery only.

Wherever a count for a misdemeanor contains a charge of assault accompanied with circumstances of greater or less aggravation, the jury may find the defendant guilty of a common assault, and acquit him of the circumstances of aggravation. (w)

This offence was punishable as a misdemeanor; and the punishment usually inflicted was fine, imprisonment, and the finding of sureties to keep the peace. (x)

Punishment.

But now, by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 47, 'Whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment

(s) Reg. v. Traughton, 1 Cox C. C. 197, Bullock, Comr., after consulting the Recorder. The latter ruling is clearly wrong; for it never yet was doubted that on a joint charge against two for any offence not requiring the participation of several, as conspiracy, &c., either might be convicted, though there was no evidence against the other; and the first point was decided on the ground that the assault proved did apply to the charge in the indictment. So that the two rulings are inconsistent with each other.

(t) Reg. v. Gordon, 1 Cox C. C. 259. Bullock, Comr., after consulting the Recorder. This ruling is directly contrary to the second ruling in the last case. The point is not a question of law: it is merely a question for the discretion of the Court, and as any number of assaults may be tried under one indictment containing a count for each, there seems no good reason for confining the evidence on one count to the first assault that may happen to be proved. Stante v. Prickett, 1 Camp. 437, was cited in support of the objection.

Common assault.

for a common assault shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour.' (y)

On a conviction for assault the Court may order payment of the prosecutor's costs by the defendant.

Sec. 74. 'Where any person shall be convicted on any indictment of any assault, whether with or without battery and wounding, or either of them, such person may, if the Court think fit, in addition to any sentence which the Court may deem proper for the offence, be adjudged to pay to the prosecutor his actual and necessary costs and expenses of the prosecution, and such moderate allowance for the loss of time as the Court shall by affidavit or other inquiry and examination ascertain to be reasonable; and, unless the sum so awarded shall be sooner paid, the offender shall be imprisoned for any term the Court shall award, not exceeding three months in addition to the term of imprisonment (if any) to which the offender may be sentenced for the offence.' (z)

Such costs may be levied by distress.

Sec. 75. 'The Court may, by warrant under hand and seal, order such sum as shall be so awarded to be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the offender, and paid to the prosecutor, and that the surplus, if any, arising from such sale, shall be paid to the owner; and in case such sum shall be so levied the imprisonment awarded until payment of such sum shall thereupon cease.'

The costs of the prosecution of misdemeanors against this Act may be allowed.

Sec. 77. 'The Court before which any misdemeanor indictable under the provisions of this Act shall be prosecuted or tried may allow the costs of the prosecution in the same manner as in cases of felony; and every order for the payment of such costs shall be made out, and the sum of money mentioned therein paid and repaid, upon the same terms and in the same manner in all respects as in cases of felony.' (a)

(y) The first part of this clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(z) This and the following clause are new in England; they are taken from the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, ss. 33, 34 (1). It had long been the practice in England in such cases for the Courts after a conviction for an assault, to allow compromises to be made between the parties, which in some cases were legal. Beeley v. Wingfield, 11 East, 46; Keir v. Leeman, 6 Q. B. 308; 9 Q. B. 371, ante, p. 195. Such compromises were usually made by the defendant paying a sum of money to the prosecutor to indemnify him for his expenses; but where there was an obstinate defendant, it frequently happened that no compromise could be effected, and the Court was sometimes placed in an invidious position. These clauses place it in the power of the Court to do full justice, without regard to the wishes or consent of either party. In every case the Court will have to exercise its discretion as to granting costs either under this section or under sec. 77; and, just as it has been the common practice where the Court has thought of imposing a fine, the Court will make such inquiries as may enable it to judge whether the defendant be able to pay the costs; nor is there ever any practical difficulty in ascertaining that fact.

(a) This clause is old as far as relates to the costs of misdemeanors against the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 11; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76. It is new as to any misdemeanor created by this Act. The words of the clause originally were 'any indictable misdemeanor against this Act;' but the Committee of the House of Commons altered them to 'any misdemeanor indictable under the provisions of this Act,' in order to exclude common assaults where no actual bodily harm had been inflicted; and this seems to be the only case in which costs cannot be given under this Act; for wherever it is necessary to insert in any indictment the particular words of any clause in this Act in order to warrant the punishment given by that clause, the misdemeanor is plainly 'indictable under the provisions of this Act;' thus, under sec. 47, in order to warrant the punishment for an assault occasioning actual bodily harm the indictment must allege such bodily harm, and therefore in that case the Court may allow the costs.

The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 3, recites the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, by which, where any person shall assault or beat any other person, two justices of the peace, upon the complaint of the party aggrieved, might hear and determine the offence; and sec. 29, by which, in case the justices find the assault or battery complained of to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony, or shall be of opinion that the same is from any other circumstance a fit subject for prosecution by indictment, they shall deal with the case as they would have done before the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, and enacts that 'in every case of assault so brought before such justices for summary decision, in which the justices shall be of opinion that the same is a fit subject for prosecution by indictment, and shall thereupon bind the complainant and witnesses in recognizances to prosecute and give evidence at the assizes or sessions of the peace, every such Court is hereby authorized and empowered at its discretion to order payment of the costs and expenses of the prosecutor and witnesses so appearing before such Court under such recognizances, together with compensation for their trouble and loss of time, in the same manner as Courts are authorized and empowered to order the same in cases of felony.'

Costs under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 3.

In order to obtain costs under this section, it must be proved that the case was taken before two justices for summary adjudication; but a summons calling on the defendant to appear before justices of the peace to answer a complaint for an assault against the form of the statute, and to be further dealt with according to law, is sufficient for that purpose. (b)

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, 'Where any person shall unlawfully assault or beat any other person, two justices of the peace, upon complaint by or on behalf of the party aggrieved, may hear and determine such offence, and the offender shall, upon conviction thereof before them, at the discretion of the justices, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two months, or else shall forfeit and pay such fine as shall appear to them to be meet, not exceeding, together with costs (if ordered), the sum of five pounds; and if such fine as shall be so awarded, together with the costs (if ordered), shall not be paid, either immediately after the conviction or within such period as the said justices shall at the time of the conviction appoint, they may commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months, unless such fine and costs be sooner paid.' (c)

Persons committing any common assault or battery may be imprisoned or compelled by two magistrates to pay a fine and costs not exceeding £5.

(b) Reg. v. McGavaron, 3 C. & K. 320, Williams, J. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 3, be not impliedly repealed by the repeal of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; but, if that be the case, it seems very immaterial; for it is hardly conceivable that a case can occur which would have fallen within that provision, and in which the costs may not be granted under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 73, or s. 75.

(c) This clause is framed from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27. Under that section the complaint could only be made by the party aggrieved. Reg. v. Deny, 2 L. M. & P. 230. This clause, in order to enable parents and others to complain on the part of an injured child, permits the complaint to be made by anyone on its behalf, and so it might under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2 (1), which is assimilated in this clause with the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27. But where a complaint has been made the justices may proceed, though the parties have made a compromise. Reg. v. Wiltshire, 8 Law T. 242. But see the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 9, which was passed for the very purpose of enabling justices in Persons convicted of aggravated assaults on females and boys under fourteen years of age may be imprisoned or fined.

Sec. 43. 'When any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace with an assault or battery upon any male child whose age shall not in the opinion of such justices exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, either upon the complaint of the party aggrieved or otherwise, the said justices, if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions hereinbefore contained as to common assaults and batteries, may proceed to hear and determine the same in a summary way, and, if the same be proved, may convict the person accused; and every such offender shall be liable to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding six months, or to pay a fine not exceeding (together with costs) the sum of twenty pounds, and in default of payment to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding six months, unless such fine and costs be sooner paid, and, if the justices shall so think fit, in any of the said cases, shall be bound to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for any period not exceeding six months from the expiration of such sentence.' (d)

If the magistrates dismiss the complaint, they shall make out a certificate to that effect.

Sec. 44. 'If the justices upon the hearing of any such case of assault or battery upon the merits, where the complaint was preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, under either of the last two preceding sections, shall deem the offence not to be proved, or shall find the assault or battery to have been justified, or so trifling as not to merit any punishment, and shall accordingly dismiss the complaint, they shall forthwith (e) make out a certificate (f) under their hands stating the fact of such dismissal, and shall deliver such certificate to the party against whom the complaint was preferred.' (g)

Ireland to proceed, even where the party assailed declined to complain. By the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, the justices had only power to fine in the first instance; by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2, they might either fine or commit for two months; and under this clause they may either fine or commit. This clause also gives the justices power to commit to hard labour either in the first instance, or on default of payment of a fine. All summary proceedings under this clause should be taken under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, where the offence is committed in England, except in London and the Metropolitan Police district, and in Ireland under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93; see sec. 76 of the Act.

(d) This clause is taken from the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 1, and extended to Ireland.

(e) In Reg. v. Robinson, 12 A. & E. 672, it was held that the certificate must be given before the justices separated; but this was doubted in Thompson v. Gibson, 8 M. & W. 281. And it is now held that the act of granting the certificate is not judicial or discretionary, but ministerial only, and therefore 'forthwith' does not mean forthwith upon the dismissal of the complaint, but forthwith upon the demand of it by the person entitled to it.

Costar v. Hetherington, 1 E. & E. 802; Hancock v. Somes, 1 E. & E. 795.

(f) The certificate must state on which of the three grounds the complaint was dismissed. Skuse v. Davis, 10 A. & E. 635; and must be specially pleaded in an action. Harding v. King, 6 C. & P. 427.

(g) This clause is limited to the case where a complaint is made by or on behalf of the party aggrieved. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, only applied to a case where the complaint was made by the party aggrieved, and unless this clause had been limited as it is, any person who had committed an aggravated assault might have got some friend to make a complaint and get the case heard by the justices, on insufficient evidence, and might, by virtue of ss. 44 and 45, have deprived the party aggrieved of any remedy by action or indictment. Under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, where a party aggrieved made a complaint, and obtained a summons and served it on the defendant, but, before the day for hearing, gave notice, both to the defendant not to attend, and to the magistrates' clerk that he should not attend, but the defendant attended, and claimed to have the information dismissed, and a certificate of dismissal granted, notwithstanding the prosecutor's absence, it was

Sec. 45. 'If any person, against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned shall have been preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or, having been convicted, shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment or imprisonment with hard labour awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause.' (h)

Certificate or conviction shall be a bar to any other proceedings.

Sec. 46. 'Provided, that in case the justices shall find (i) the assault or battery complained of to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony, or shall be of opinion that the same is, from any other circumstance, a fit subject for a prosecution by indictment, they shall abstain from any adjudication thereupon, and shall deal with the case in all respects in the same manner as if they had no authority finally to hear and determine the same: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall authorize any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title (k) to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, or as to any bankruptcy or insolvency, or any execution under the process of any court of justice.' (l) held that the justices were warranted in granting such certificate, and that it was a bar to an action for the assault. Tunnicliffe v. Tedd, 5 C. B. 553; Vaughton v. Bradshaw, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 103. Under the present clause these cases are no authority; for in order to obtain a certificate under it the case must be heard 'upon the merits;' that is, the decision of the justices must be after having heard the evidence. The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 21 (l), required the justices to state in the certificate that the dismissal was on the merits, or that the assault was of a trifling or justifiable nature.

harm to him, and the last for a common assault; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that pleas of a dismissal of a complaint for the same assault under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, were a bar to the indictment, on the ground that the two first counts only charged the same assault with certain aggravations, and the last only charged the same assault. This was an indictment for misdemeanor, and the decision clearly right.

(i) Where the defendant had been convicted of a common assault, though it was alleged that the evidence showed a felonious assault, and a certiorari was moved for on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the justices had found that the assault was not 'accompanied by any attempt to commit felony,' which they had jurisdiction to determine, Lord Tenterden relying especially on the words 'in case the justices shall find the assault or battery to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony,' in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 29. Anonymous, 1 B. & Ad. 382. Dutton*, 8 Law T. 276, where it was held that the justices might convict of an assault, though the charge amounted to a rape.

(l) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 29; and see the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2 (l).

(h) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 28; and see the 14 and 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 21. See the note to the last section. Several decisions occurred under the former clause, whilst the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 11, which authorized a conviction of an assault on an indictment for felony, was in force, as to the cases in which a plea of autrefois acquit and convict might be sustained, and these will be found, together with remarks upon them, in Greaves' Crim. Acts, p. 71, 2nd Edition; but as that clause was repealed by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 10, there cannot now be a conviction of an assault upon any indictment for felony, and it seems clear that autrefois acquit or convict by the common law cannot be pleaded in any case, unless the prisoner might be convicted on the former indictment, either of the whole or at least of part of the criminal charge contained in it. In Reg. v. Elrington, 5 Law T. R. 284, the first count was for assaulting and doing grievous bodily harm to the prosecutor; the second for assaulting and doing actual bodily

SEC. II.

Of Aggravated Assaults.

[761] ATTEMPTS to murder, or to do some great bodily harm, (m) and assaults with intent to ravish, (n) or to commit an unnatural crime, (o) have been already noticed. Also assaults occurring in the obstruction of officers executing process, (p) in effecting a rescue, (q) in the obstruction of revenue officers, (r) and in the hindering the exportation or circulation of corn, (s) have been mentioned in the course of the Work. The aggravated assaults which remain to be noticed in this place, are principally such as have been made a subject of particular legislative provision; and the peculiar aggravation appears to arise, either from the place in which, or the person upon whom, the assault is committed, or else from the great criminality of the purpose or object intended to be effected.

Smiting, or

The 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, relates to disturbances in churches and churchyards; and the second section enacts, 'that if any person or persons shall smite, or lay violent hands upon any other, either in any church or churchyard,' every person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate. (t)

Some points upon the construction of this statute have been mentioned in a former part of this Work; where it was stated, that cathedral churches and churchyards are within it; that it will be no excuse for a person who strikes another in a church, &c., to show that the other assaulted him; and that the churchwardens and perhaps private persons, who whip boys for playing in the church, or pull off the hats of those who obstinately refuse to take them off themselves, or gently lay their hands upon those who disturb the performance of any part of divine service, and turn them out of the church, are not within the meaning of the statute. (u)

Striking in the

Contempts against the King's palaces have always been looked upon as high misprisions; and, by the ancient law before the Conquest, fighting in the King's palaces, or before the King's judges, was punished with death. (v) The 33 Hen. 8, c. 12, provided severe punishment for all malicious strikings by which blood was shed within any of the King's palaces or houses, or any other house, at such time as the royal person happened to be there abiding; but these provisions were repealed by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 1.

Striking in the King's superior courts of justice in Westminster-hall, or in any other place, while the Courts are sitting, whether the Court of Chancery, Exchequer, King's Bench, or Common Pleas, or before Justices of assize, or Oyer and Terminer, is made still more penal than even in the King's palace; perhaps for the reason that, those Courts being anciently held in the King's palace, and before the King himself, striking there included the former contempt against the King's palace and something more, namely, the disturbance of public justice. (w) So that, though striking in the King's palace was not punished with the loss of the offender's hand, unless some blood were drawn, nor even then with the loss of lands and goods, the drawing of a weapon only upon a judge or justice in such Courts, though the party strike not, is a great misprision, punishable by the loss of the right hand, perpetual imprisonment, and forfeiture of the party's lands during life, and of his goods and chattels. (x) And a party is liable to a similar punishment, if, in the same Courts, and within their view, he strike a juror or any other person, either with a weapon, or with hand, shoulder, elbow, or foot; but he is not liable to such punishment if he make an assault only, and do not strike. (y) And one who is guilty of this offence cannot excuse himself by showing that the person so struck by him gave the first offence. (z)

In a modern case, the three first counts of the information set forth a special commission for the trial of Arthur O'Connor and others for high treason; and that, pending the sessions, after the acquittal of O'Connor, and before any order or direction had been made by the Court for his discharge, the defendants, in open court, &c., made a great riot, and riotously attempted to rescue him out of the custody of the sheriff, to whose custody he had been assigned by the justices and commissioners; and, the better to effect such rescue and escape, did, at the said sessions, in open court, and in the presence of the said justices and commissioners, riotously, &c., make an assault on one J. R., and beat, bruise, wound, and ill-treat the said J. R., and thereby impede and obstruct the said justices, &c. There were two other counts in the information; the one for riotously interrupting and obstructing the justices in the holding of the session, and the other for a common riot. (a) Two of the defendants having been found guilty generally, considerable doubt was intimated by Lord Kenyon, whether the Court were not bound to pass the judgment of amputation, &c., for the offence, as laid in the three first counts; and the matter stood over for consideration. But before the defendants were again brought up to receive judgment, the Attorney-General said, that he had received the royal command and warrant under the sign manual, whereby he was authorized to enter a noli prosequi, as to those parts of the information on which any doubt had arisen, or might arise, whether the judgment

such courts

A person who rescues a prisoner from any of the Courts which have been mentioned, without striking a blow, is punished with perpetual imprisonment, and forfeiture of goods, and of the profits of lands during life; for this offence is, in its nature, similar to the other; but as it differs in this, that no blow is actually given, the amputation of the hand is excused. (c) And for the like reason, an affray or riot near the said Courts, but out of their actual view, is punishable by fine and imprisonment during pleasure, but not with the loss of the hand. (d)

Inferior courts.

Though an assault in any of the King's inferior courts of justice would not subject the offender to lose his hand; (e) yet, upon an indictment for such an assault, the circumstances under which it was committed would, doubtless, be considered as a matter of great aggravation. And any affray or contemptuous behaviour in those courts, is punishable with a fine, by the Judges there sitting. (f)

Indictment.

It is said that, in order to warrant the higher judgment, the offence must be charged to have been committed in the presence of the King, or of the Justices. (g) And it seems also that in order to warrant such judgment, the indictment ought expressly to charge a stroke; though it does not appear whether any technical word be necessary to be used for that purpose. (h)

Assault with intent to commit a robbery.

Amongst the principal of those assaults, the aggravated nature of which may be said to arise from the great criminality of the object intended to be effected, is an assault upon a person with a felonious intent to commit a robbery, and nearly allied to this is a demand of property effected by menaces or force, and with the intent of stealing such property. These offences were in the former editions dealt with in this place, but they are now placed in the Chapter on Robbery, as well because that appears to be their fitter place, as because, on a trial for robbery, the accused may now be convicted of an assault with intent to rob.

The provision relating to assaults upon clergymen and obstructing them in the performance of their duties has already been inserted. (h)

Assaulting clergymen.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 37, ‘Whosoever shall assault and strike or wound any magistrate, officer, or other person whatsoever lawfully authorized, in or on account of the exercise of his duty in or concerning the preservation of any vessel in distress, or of any vessel, goods, or effects wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, or lying under water, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.’ (l)

Assaulting a magistrate, &c. on account of his preserving wreck.

Sec. 38. ‘Whosoever shall assault any person with intent to commit felony, or shall assault, resist, or wilfully obstruct any peace officer in the due execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer, or shall assault any person with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of himself or of any other person for any offence, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.’ (m)

Assault with intent to commit felony, or on peace officers, &c.

Sec. 39. ‘Whosoever shall beat, or use any violence or threat of violence to any person, with intent to deter or hinder him from buying, selling, or otherwise disposing of, or to compel him to buy, sell, or otherwise dispose of, any wheat or other grain, flour, meal, malt, or potatoes, in any market or other place, or shall beat or use any such violence or threat to any person having the care or charge of any wheat or other grain, flour, meal, malt, or potatoes, whilst on the way to or from any city, market town, or other place, with intent to stop the conveyance of the same, shall, on conviction thereof before two justices of the peace, be liable to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding three months: Provided that no person who shall be punished for any such offence by virtue of this section shall be punished for the same offence by virtue of any other law whatsoever.’ (n)

(m) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 25, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 31 (I.). This clause extends the former enactments to resisting and wilfully obstructing peace officers. Revenue officers were included in the former clause, but are omitted in this, because assaults on them are otherwise provided for. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 251, ante, p. 177. As to hard labour, &c., see the last note.

(n) This section assimilates part of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 26, and part of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2. It omits the word ‘wound’ in the former, because a wounding with any of the intents specified in this clause would fall within section 20 of this Act; and it introduces ‘threat of violence,’ and the intent to compel the party to buy, sell, or dispose of any of the things specified. 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 41. Special constables.

By the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 1, two or more justices, upon information upon oath, that disturbances are likely to take place, may appoint special constables out of the householders, or other persons (not legally exempt from serving the office of constable,) residing in any parish, township, or place wherein disturbances are likely to occur, or in the neighbourhood thereof; and by sec. 5, every special constable, so appointed, shall not only within the parish, township, or place for which he shall have been appointed, but also throughout the entire jurisdiction of the justices appointing him, have, exercise, and enjoy all such powers, authorities, advantages and immunities, and be liable to all such duties and responsibilities as any constable duly appointed now has within his constablewick, by virtue of the common law of this realm, or of any statute or statutes.

A special constable, appointed under this Act, continues such, and has all the authority of an ordinary constable, until his services are either suspended or determined under sec. 9 of the Act, although eight years may have elapsed since his appointment. (q)

5 & 6 Will. 4,
c. 43.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 43, s. 1, makes all persons, willing to act as special constables, capable of being appointed, although they may not be resident in the parish, township or place, or in the neighbourhood thereof, and gives such persons all the same powers, &c., when appointed, as the special constables appointed under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 41.

all summary proceedings under this clause should be taken under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, where the offence is committed in England, except in London and the Metropolitan Police district, and in Ireland under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93. See ante, p. 183, et seq.

(o) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 26, and is new in Ireland. The summary proceedings under this clause should be taken in the same manner as under the preceding clause. See the last note.

(p) This clause is taken partly from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 25, which had the words 'any assault committed in pursuance of any conspiracy to raise the rate of wages;' and the rest from the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 28 (L.), but that clause required the assault to be committed 'with intent to do grievous bodily harm,' and made the punishment seven years' transportation. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, consolidates certain provisions usually contained in Acts for regulating the police of towns, and by sec. 8, 'any justice may swear in any person appointed and employed as a constable under this and the special Act, and the constables so sworn in shall have, within the limits of the special Act, and in any place not more than five miles beyond such limits, the like powers, privileges, and duties, and shall have the same indemnities and protection, and shall be subject to the like penalties and forfeitures, as any constable duly appointed has or is subject to within his constablewick by law.'

Constables, &c.

Evidence of acting as such is sufficient.

Their powers in keeping the peace.

As prosecutions for assaulting constables, and other peace officers, are by no means uncommon, it may be well to introduce in this place some of the authorities, which may be useful in such prosecutions. In the case of all justices of the peace, peace officers, constables, &c., it is sufficient to prove that they acted in those characters, without producing their appointments, and that even in a case of murder, (u) and this rule extends to constables and watchmen appointed under local Acts. (v)

Constables, and other peace officers, are invested with large powers and extensive authority at common law, for the purpose of preserving the peace, preventing the commission of crimes and misdemeanors, apprehending offenders, and executing the warrants, of justices of the peace. Every high and petty constable, within the limits of their hundreds and districts, are conservators of the peace at common law. (w) It is their duty, therefore, to do all that they can to preserve the peace within their respective constablewicks: and for this purpose, they not only may, but ought to, apprehend any person who shall make an affray or assault upon another in their presence, or who shall threaten to kill, beat, or hurt another, or shall be ready to break the peace in their presence, and may take such persons before a justice of the peace, in order that they may find surety for the peace. (x) So also by the common law, the sheriff, under sheriff, constable, or any other peace officer may and ought to do all that in them lies towards the suppressing of a riot. (y) And in order the better to enable peace officers to preserve the peace, they have authority to command all other persons to assist them, in endeavouring to appease such disturbances as take place in their presence. (z)

In misdemeanor.

In all cases of felony, a peace officer has not only authority to apprehend a felon while committing the felony, but also upon pursuit, or information at any time afterwards; (a) and he may even justify apprehending an innocent person, if he have reasonable ground to suspect that he is guilty of felony, and this although no felony have been committed. (b) In all cases of misdemeanor, a peace officer may apprehend the party while committing the offence; (c) and, it should seem, upon fresh and immediate pursuit, in some instances. (d) But the general rule is, that if a misdemeanor be committed in the absence of a peace officer, he cannot afterwards apprehend the party who committed it. (e) It has been said, that a constable may take those before a justice, who were arrested by such as were present at an affray, but this may well be doubted. (f) But a constable may arrest, if a witness to an affray gives one of the affrayers in charge to the constable on the spot where it was committed, and whilst there is a reasonable apprehension of its continuance. (g) So a constable may apprehend a person while attempting to commit a felony; (h) or, it should seem, even upon fresh pursuit, after he had desisted from the attempt. (i)

If an officer hear a disturbance in a public-house in the night, and the door be open, he may enter. (k) But he has no authority to turn anyone out of a public-house, unless the party had committed some offence punishable by law. (l) Nor to prevent a guest from going into a room in such house, unless a breach of the peace was likely to occur. (m) But if a person makes such a disturbance in a public-house as is calculated to alarm the neighbourhood, a policeman may apprehend him. (n)

In public-houses.

It is to be observed, that the authority of a constable, or other peace officer, to act without a warrant, is confined by the common law to the district for which he is an officer, and consequently he cannot legally act as an officer in any other district. (o)

Within his district.

The constable is the proper officer to the justice of the peace, and bound to execute his warrants; and, therefore, where a statute authorizes a justice of the peace to convict a man of a crime, and to levy the penalty by warrant of distress without saying to whom such warrant shall be directed, or by whom it shall be executed, the constable is the proper officer to execute such warrant; (p) and inasmuch as the office of constable is wholly ministerial, and no way judicial, it seems that he may appoint a deputy to execute a warrant directed to him, when by reason of sickness, absence, or otherwise, he cannot do it himself. (q)

Executing warrants.

At common law, where a warrant was directed to officers as individuals, they might execute it anywhere within the extent of the magistrate's jurisdiction who granted it; but where it was directed to persons, by the name of their office, it was confined to the districts in which they were officers. (r) If, therefore, a warrant was directed to 'the constable of the parish of S.,' such constable had no authority at common law to execute it out of the parish of S.; and if he attempted so to do, he was a trespasser. (s) But now, by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 10, and c. 43, s. 3, a constable, in such a case, may execute a warrant out of his precinct at any place within the jurisdiction of the magistrate who granted it. (t)

If a warrant be good upon the face of it, and for an offence within the jurisdiction of the justice, the falsity of the charge will not prevent the execution of the warrant from being legal. (u) But if the warrant be bad upon the face of it, as if the name of the person on whom it is to be executed be insufficiently stated, or the name of the officer who is to execute it be inserted after the warrant is issued, the officer will not be justified in acting under it. (v) So a constable cannot justify an arrest by virtue of a warrant, which appears on the face of it to be for an offence, whereof a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction, or to bring the party before him at a place out of the county for which he is a justice, (w) or by virtue of a blank warrant. (x) A constable in executing a warrant must act in strict conformity with the warrant, otherwise he is a trespasser. He cannot, therefore, justify apprehending Richard H., under a warrant to apprehend John H. (y) So in executing a search warrant, he cannot justify seizing any goods except the goods specified in the warrant, unless perhaps in a case where they would furnish evidence of the identity of the goods stolen. (z)

The right of officers to break open doors or windows in order to make an arrest has already been considered, (a) as has also the necessity of giving due notice of the officer's business. (b) and so have the cases of officers taking opposite sides in an affray. (c)

of excess.

In all cases where officers are authorized to act, they must exercise their authority in a proper manner, and if they exceed the reasonable bounds of what is required for the due performance of their duties, they become wrong doers. Thus if a constable arrest a man upon suspicion of felony, he must take him as soon as he reasonably can before a magistrate for examination, and if he keep him in custody for an unreasonable time, as, for instance, three days, before he does so, he becomes a trespasser. (d) So a constable is bound to treat a prisoner, while in his custody, with no greater severity than is necessary to prevent his escape; if, therefore, he handcuff a prisoner where it is not necessary in order to prevent his escape, or where he has not attempted to escape, he is a trespasser. (e) With respect to handcuffing, the law undoubtedly is, that constables are not only justified, but are bound to take all reasonably requisite measures for preventing the escape of those persons they have in custody for the purpose of taking them before the magistrates; but what those reasonable measures are must depend entirely upon the circumstances, upon the temper and conduct of the person in custody, on the nature of the charge, and a variety of other circumstances which must present themselves to the mind of anyone. There is no general rule that everyone conveyed before the magistrates is to be handcuffed, and any such rule is unjustifiable in law; and in every case of the kind, the question for the jury is whether, looking at all the circumstances of the case, the constable used reasonable precautions, or used unnecessary measures, to secure the safe custody of his prisoner. (f) So with respect to searching a prisoner, there is no doubt that a man when in custody may so conduct himself, by reason of the violence of his language or conduct, that a constable may reasonably think it prudent and right to search him in order to ascertain whether he has any weapon with which he might do mischief to the person, or commit a breach of the peace; but no general rule can be applied to all such cases. Even when a man is confined for being drunk and disorderly, it is not always necessary that he should be searched, as the searching of such a person must depend upon all the circumstances of the case. (g) So although a constable may be justified in removing from church a person who attempts to read a notice in the church, and detaining him until the service is over, he cannot legally detain him afterwards in order to take him before a magistrate. (h)

The following cases have been decided as to assaults upon collectors of taxes and peace officers called in to assist them in the execution of their duties. In order to justify a distress for assessed taxes under the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99, s. 33, it is not necessary that there should have been a personal demand by the collector, or a personal refusal by the party distrained upon. Nor is it essential that the demand, to which the refusal applies, should have specified the precise amount claimed, if the debtor understood what the amount was, and did not object to it. If a count for assaulting a party in possession of goods distrained for assessed taxes states the sum for which they were distrained, and a different sum is proved, this is a fatal variance; but if a count mention no sum the defendant may be convicted, if the party be proved to have been lawfully in possession for any amount. Upon an indictment, the first count of which charged the defendants with assaulting J. S., then being in lawful possession of goods seized for 6*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, arrears of assessed taxes, and the second count with a common assault, it appeared that the goods of one Ford had been distrained on his premises for taxes due from him, and J. S. had been left in possession. In order to show that the taxes had been regularly demanded before putting in the distress, it was proved that the collector had gone to Ford's house on the 23rd of January, and Ford not being at home, had demanded the taxes of a female who was there, and said that he had called often before, and would distrain on the following day if they were not paid. The woman answered that Ford had been told before of the collector's coming for taxes, but said he could not pay; the collector left a message with the woman, requesting Ford to call on him, which Ford afterwards did, and stated that he was very poor and could not pay; it was objected that this was not sufficient evidence of a demand and refusal within the terms of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99, s. 33; but Lord Denman, C. J., held that it was not necessary to show a refusal given by the householder himself, or to the collector personally; but that it was sufficient, if the circumstances showed that the householder, from poverty or otherwise, would not pay, and if the party meeting with the refusal was one authorized to act for him; and he left it to the jury to say whether they were satisfied that there had been a refusal: his lordship also held that as the first count specified a particular amount of arrears, and a different one was proved, that count was not maintainable; but upon the second, which mentioned no sum, that there might be a verdict against the defendants, if the prosecutor was lawfully in possession for any amount: and upon a motion for a new trial the Court held that the motion should be refused: by the statute a distress is to be taken only if there shall have been a demand and refusal of the taxes, but nothing is said to apply that provision to particular individuals, or particular sums: it is sufficient if there has been a demand of the taxes, which the party has understood, and he has not objected to the amount, but has refused to pay. (7)

A collector of land-tax is not authorized to take a constable with him, unless he apprehends a breach of the peace.

A collector of land-tax is not entitled, under the provisions of the 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 17, or under his general authority, to take a constable with him into the house of a person from whom he is demanding payment of the arrears of land-tax. But if he has reasonable ground (from past or present circumstances) to apprehend violence from such person, he may call in constables to assist in keeping the peace, and such constables are justified in staying while the collector remains to be paid, as long as there is reason to expect violence, and if the owner of the house use violence to remove them, he is indictable for assaulting a peace officer in the execution of his duty. Such a collector has a general authority, under the Act, to distrain, and a special warrant is not necessary; and he need not have his warrant or the book of assessments with him at the time he distrains. Clark and Austen were indicted for assaulting Grinder, a peace officer, in the execution of his duty, and for a common assault. Tipper, a collector of land-tax, had applied on the 28th of October to Clark for arrears of land-tax due from him, which had been repeatedly demanded before; Clark said, 'I suppose if I do not pay it, you are going to distrain?' Tipper replied that he probably should. Clark answered, 'If you put your hand upon anything, I will split your skull.' Collins, a constable, was with Tipper on this occasion. On the 29th of November following, Tipper went to Clark's house, with Collins, Grinder, and a third constable: he desired the two last to remain outside, and to be on the alert, lest there should be a row: he and Collins entered a room, and again demanded the arrears; as soon as the demand was made Clark quitted the room, and directly afterwards he was heard to fasten the house door; upon this, Collins, by Tipper's order, unfastened the door, and brought in Grinder and the other constable. Clark soon afterwards returned into the room, with bank notes in his hand, accompanied by ten or twelve men, among whom was Austen. Clark asked what Grinder did there; and Collins answered that Grinder was there to aid and assist if required: upon this Clark said, 'I will not pay the taxes till the thief-catcher has left the room.' Grinder refused to depart, upon which Clark desired Austen to put him out, saying that he would be answerable; Austen then attempted to force Grinder out of the room, and, in so doing, committed the assault in question. Clark afterwards paid the taxes with the notes in his hand. It was left to the jury to say, whether Tipper introduced Grinder for the purpose of keeping the peace, and if they thought he did so, they were directed to find a verdict of guilty; the jury found in the affirmative of the question left, and convicted both defendants. Upon a motion for a new trial, it was contended that the collector had no right to take a constable with him; that it ought to have been shown that the collector had a warrant to distrain, or the book of assessments with him; but it was held that it was not necessary that the collector should have either the warrant or the book of assessments with him; and although the statute was applicable only to cases where a house or chest was to be broken open, and therefore the collector had no right to take Collins or any other person with him for the purpose of demanding the money; yet as the collector had good ground, from what had passed at that time and on the previous occasion, to apprehend violence, he was perfectly justified in introducing Grinder and the other constable to keep the peace, and that Grinder was justified in remaining to prevent violence, and consequently was assaulted whilst in the execution of his duty. And although the collector had no right to take Collins into the house on either occasion, yet, as no objection was made to his presence, it did not vary the case. (h)

It seems to be settled, that an arrest unlawfully made by a constable, without a warrant, cannot be made good by a warrant taken out afterwards. (l) Also it has been held, that if a constable, after he has arrested a party by force of a warrant, suffer him to go at large, upon his promise to return at such a time, and find sureties, he cannot afterwards arrest him again by virtue of the same warrant. (m) However, if the party return, and put himself again under the custody of the constable, it seems that it may probably be argued that the constable may lawfully detain him, and bring him before a justice in pursuance of the warrant. (n)

arrest.

An indictment for assaulting an officer, in the execution of his duty, under a warrant, must clearly show that he is such an officer as is authorized to execute the warrant; and if it do not, the defendant cannot be sentenced upon it for a common assault. A count for assaulting A., in the execution of his office, imprisoning him, and preventing him from arresting a person, as he was commanded, by a writ issued by the Court of Record of a town and county, merely described A. as 'one of the serjeants-at-mace of the said town and county,' and the judgment was arrested, because it did not appear that A. was a legal officer of the Court out of which the writ issued; for a serjeant-at-mace, ex vi termini, means no more than a person who carried a mace for somebody, and the indictment did not show for whom; and taking the whole count together, the jury, in effect, had found that there was an assault and imprisonment, but committed under circumstances which justified the defendant, and therefore there was not sufficient to sustain the judgment, as for a common assault, or for an imprisonment. enacts, 'That if any person, armed with any offensive weapon whatsoever, shall with force or violence assault or resist any officer of excise, or any person employed in the revenue or excise, or any person acting in the aid or assistance of such officer or person so employed, who, in the execution of his office or duty, shall search for, take, or seize, or shall endeavour or offer to search for, take, or seize, any goods or commodities forfeited under or by virtue of this Act, or any other Act or Acts of Parliament, relating to the revenue of excise or customs, or who shall search for, take, or seize, or shall endeavour or offer to search for, take, or seize any vessel, boat, cart, carriage, or other conveyance, or any horse, cattle, or other thing used in the removal of any such goods or commodities, or who shall arrest, or endeavour or offer to arrest, any person carrying, removing or concealing the same, or employed or concerned therein, and liable to such arrest, then and in every such case, it shall be lawful for every such officer and person so employed, and person acting in such aid and assistance as aforesaid, who shall be so assaulted or resisted, to oppose force to force, and by the same means and methods by which he is so assaulted or resisted, or by any other means or methods, to oppose such force and violence, and to execute his office or duty, and if any person so assaulting or resisting such officer as aforesaid, or any person so employed, or any person acting in such aid and assistance as aforesaid, shall in so doing be wounded, maimed, or killed, and the said officer or person so employed, or person acting in such aid and assistance as aforesaid, shall be sued or prosecuted for any such wounding, maiming, or killing, it shall be lawful for every such officer, or person so employed, or person acting in such aid and assistance, to plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence in his defence: and it shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate or magistrates before whom any such officer or person so employed, or person acting in such aid and assistance as aforesaid, shall be brought for, or on account of, any such wounding, maiming, or killing as aforesaid, and every such justice of the peace and magistrate is hereby directed and required to admit to bail every such officer, and every person so employed, and every person acting in such aid and assistance as aforesaid, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.' (p)

By sec. 43, for the better and more impartial trial of any indictment or information for any such violent assault, as aforesaid, 'every such offence shall and may be inquired of, examined, tried, and determined in any county in England, if such offence shall have been committed in England or in any of the islands thereof, or in any county in Scotland, if the same shall have been committed in Scotland or in any of the islands thereof, or in any county in Ireland, if the same shall have been committed in Ireland or in any of the islands thereof, in such manner and form as

(p) By sec. 41, persons against whom indictments or informations have been found or filed for such assaults, are to be bound with two sureties to answer the same, and in default to be committed:

by sec. 42, if any offender be in prison for want of bail, a copy of the indictment or information may be delivered to the gaoler with a notice of trial and proceedings had thereon.

if the same offence had been committed in such county respectively; (q) and that whenever any person shall be convicted of any such violent assault or resistance as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Court before which any such offender shall be convicted, or which by law is authorized to pass sentence upon any such offender, to award and order (if such Court shall think fit,) sentence of imprisonment, with hard labour, for any term not exceeding the term of three years, either in addition to, or in lieu of, any other punishment or penalty which may by law be inflicted or imposed upon any such offender, and every such offender shall thereupon suffer such sentence in such place, and for such term as aforesaid, as such Court shall think fit to direct.' (r)

Punishment.

By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 29, s. 21, relating to Pentonville Prison, and by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26, s. 19, relating to Millbank Prison, any convict who assaults the governor or any officer or servant employed in either of these prisons, is liable 'to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years in addition to the term for which, at the time of committing such offence, he was subject to be confined, and shall also be liable to corporal punishment, if the Court shall so order.'

Officers of Pentonville and Millbank.

By the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 9, 'Where any person shall be charged with and convicted of any assault upon any officer of a workhouse or relieving officer in the due execution of his duty, or upon any person acting in aid of such officer, the Court may sentence the offender to the same punishment as is provided by law for an assault upon a peace officer or revenue officer in the due execution of his duty, and shall have the same power as in cases of such last-mentioned assault to order payment of the costs and expenses of the prosecution.' And by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, s. 18, the preceding clause is extended to 'an assault upon any person included under the word "officer" in the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, or upon any other person acting in his aid;' and by sec. 109 of the last-mentioned Act, the term 'officer' includes 'any clergyman, schoolmaster, person duly licensed to practise as a medical man, vestry clerk, treasurer, collector, assistant overseer, governor, master or mistress of a workhouse, or any other person who shall be employed in any parish or union in carrying this Act or the laws for the relief of the poor into execution, and whether performing one or more of the above-mentioned functions.'

Assaults on poor-law officers.

We have seen that by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11, (s) any person whatsoever may apprehend any person who shall be found committing any indictable offence in the night, and may convey or deliver him to any constable or peace officer in order to his being conveyed, as soon as reasonably may be, before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law; and by sec. 12,

Assaults on persons apprehending offenders by night.

(q) This provision would probably be held to extend only to assaults upon officers when in the execution of their duty. If, therefore, upon an indictment containing counts for assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty, and for a common assault, the jury were to acquit on all the counts except on that for the common assault, the judgment would be arrested if the venue were laid in any county except that in which the assault was committed. Rex v. Cartwright, 4 T. R. 490, ante, p. 182.

(r) Some of the provisions of this Act are repealed by the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 51, and the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 20, but not the provisions above set forth. C. S. G.

(s) Ante, p. 648.

Any person assaulting any person entitled to apprehend him under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, to be guilty of a misdemeanor.

A person loitering at night and suspected of any felony against the Act, may be apprehended.

‘if any person liable to be apprehended under the provisions of this Act, shall assault or offer any violence to any person by law authorized to apprehend or detain him, or to any person acting in his aid or assistance, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three years.’

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 66, ‘Any constable or peace officer may take into custody, without a warrant, any person whom he shall find lying or loitering in any highway, yard, or other place during the night, and whom he shall suspect of having committed, or being about to commit, any felony in this Act mentioned, and shall take such person as soon as reasonably may be before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law.’ (t)

If any person were to assault, obstruct, or resist any constable or peace officer whilst apprehending any other person under the preceding section, the person so offending would be punishable under sec. 38. (u)

(t) This clause is taken from the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, secs. 13 & 14, and extended to all the felonies under this Act.

CHAPTER THE ELEVENTH.

OF MAIMING, &c. BY THE FURIOUS DRIVING, &c. OF COACHMEN.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 35, 'Whosoever, having the charge of any carriage or vehicle, shall, by wanton or furious driving or racing, or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, do or cause to be done any bodily harm to any person whatsoever, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (a)

[783] Drivers of carriages injuring persons by furious driving.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 38, every person convicted of working or navigating any wherry, boat, or other vessel licensed to carry persons or passengers on the river Thames, in which any greater number of persons or passengers shall be taken or carried than are allowed to be carried therein, in case any one or more of them shall by reason thereof be drowned, besides being liable to be punished for a misdemeanor, is disfranchised and not allowed at any time thereafter to work, row, or navigate any wherry, boat, or other vessel, or to enjoy any of the privileges of a freeman of the company of 'The Master, Wardens, and Commonalty of Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames.'

(a) This clause is taken from the 1 Geo. 4, c. 4, which was confined to stage-coaches and public carriages, and to the wanton and furious driving or racing, or wilful misconduct of coachmen and others having the charge of such coaches or carriages. The present section includes all carriages and vehicles, and extends also to wilful neglect. As to the meaning of the term 'wilful,' see post, p. 1059. As to counsellors and abettors, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900. The Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland.

CHAPTER THE TWELFTH.

OF SETTING SPRING GUNS, &c.

Setting spring guns, &c. with intent to inflict grievous bodily harm.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 31, 'Whosoever shall set or place, or cause to be set or placed, any spring gun, man trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life or inflict grievous bodily harm, with the intent that the same or whereby the same may destroy or inflict grievous bodily harm upon a trespasser or other person coming in contact therewith, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and whosoever shall knowingly and wilfully permit any such spring gun, man trap, or other engine which may have been set or placed in any place then being in or afterwards coming into his possession or occupation by some other person, to continue so set or placed, shall be deemed to have set and placed such gun, trap, or engine with such intent as aforesaid: Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to make it illegal to set or place any gin or trap such as may have been or may be usually set or placed with the intent of destroying vermin: Provided also, that nothing in this section shall be deemed to make it unlawful to set or place, or cause to be set or placed, or to be continued set or placed, from sunset to sunrise, any spring gun, man trap, or other engine which shall be set or placed, or caused or continued to be set or placed, in a dwelling house, for the protection thereof.' (a)

A dog-spear was not within the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18.

The setting dog-spears in a wood is not an illegal act at common law, and it was not rendered so by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18. Where, therefore, a declaration stated that there was a public footpath through a wood, and that the defendant unlawfully set a dog-spear, being an engine calculated to do grievous bodily harm, as well to the liege subjects as to their dogs, near to the said footway; by means whereof the plaintiff's dog, whilst in pursuit of a rabbit, ran upon the spear and was wounded; and the plea alleged that the spear was set for the purpose of preserving the game: it was held that the plea was good; for the setting of dog-spears is not an illegal act in itself, nor was it rendered such by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18, and, although it was admitted by these pleadings that the spear was calculated to do grievous bodily harm to human beings, still it did not appear to have been set with that intention. (b)

(a) This clause is framed from the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18, with some slight verbal alterations. As to counsellors and abettors, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900. The Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland.

(b) Jordin v. Crump, 8 M. & W. 782.

So where in an action on the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18, for unlawfully setting an engine calculated to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the plaintiff went at night into the defendant's garden and searched among some bushes for a fowl, and while so engaged he came in contact with a wire which caused a loud explosion, whereby the plaintiff was knocked down, and slightly injured in his face and eyes; but there was no evidence to show what was the nature of the engine or of the substance which caused the explosion; it was held that it was not enough that the instrument was one calculated to create alarm, but that it must be calculated to destroy human life, or to inflict grievous bodily harm. (c)

The instrument must be calculated to destroy life or cause grievous bodily harm.

CHAPTER THE THIRTEENTH.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO RAILWAYS AND RAILWAY TRAINS.

ALTHOUGH, perhaps, it may be departing from a strictly accurate distribution of offences to collect the clauses creating offences relating to railways and railway trains in one chapter, yet, as such a course appears to be likely to be of more practical utility, it has been adopted.

Punishment of servants of railway com-
of misconduct.

By the 3 & 4 Viet. c. 97, general provisions are made for the regulation of railways, and by sec. 13, 'It shall be lawful for any officer or agent of any railway company, or for any special constable duly appointed, and all such persons as they may call to their assistance, to seize and detain any engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant in the employ of such company who shall be found drunk while employed upon the railway, or commit any offence against any of the byelaws, rules, or regulations of such company, or shall wilfully, maliciously, or negligently do or omit to do any act whereby the life or limb of any person passing along or being upon the railway belonging to such company, or the works thereof respectively, shall be or might be injured or endangered, or whereby the passage of any of the engines, carriages, or trains shall be or might be obstructed or impeded, and to convey such engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant so offending, or any person counselling, aiding, or assisting in such offence, with all convenient despatch, before some justice of the peace for the place within which such offence shall be committed, without any other warrant or authority than this Act; and every such person so offending, and every person counselling, aiding, or assisting therein as aforesaid, shall, when convicted before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorized and required, upon complaint to him made, upon oath, without information in writing, to take cognizance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises), in the discretion of such justice, be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two calendar months, or, in the like discretion of such justice, shall for every such offence forfeit to Her Majesty any sum not exceeding ten pounds, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned, with or without hard labour as aforesaid, for such period, not exceeding two calendar months, as such justice shall appoint; such commitment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty; and every such penalty shall be returned to the next ensuing Court of Quarter Sessions in the usual manner.'

Justice of the peace empowered to send any case

Sec. 14. 'Provided always, and be it enacted, that (if upon the hearing of any such complaint he shall think fit) it shall be lawful for such justice, instead of deciding upon the matter of complaint summarily, to commit the person or persons charged with such offence for trial for the same at the Quarter Sessions for the county or place wherein such offence shall have been committed, and to order that any such person so committed shall be imprisoned and detained in any of Her Majesty's gaols or houses of correction in the said county or place in the meantime, or to take bail for his appearance, with or without sureties, in his discretion; and every such person so offending, and convicted before such Court of Quarter Sessions as aforesaid (which said Court is hereby required to take cognizance of and hear and determine such complaint), shall be liable, in the discretion of such Court, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.'

to be tried by the Quarter Sessions.

Sec. 21. 'Wherever the word "railway" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to all railways constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and intended for the conveyance of passengers in or upon carriages drawn or impelled by the power of steam or by any other mechanical power; and wherever the word "company" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to and include the proprietors for the time being of any such railway, whether a body corporate or individuals, and their lessees, executors, administrators, and assigns, unless the subject or context be repugnant to such construction.'

Meaning of the words 'railway' and 'company.'

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 32, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously put or throw upon or across any railway any wood, stone or other matter or thing, or shall unlawfully and maliciously take up, remove, or displace any rail, sleeper, or other matter or thing belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously turn, move, or divert any points or other machinery belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously make or show, hide or remove, any signal or light upon or near to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any other matter or thing, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to endanger the safety of any person travelling or being upon such railway, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping.' (a)

Placing wood, &c. on a railway, with intent to endanger passengers.

Sec. 33. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously throw, or cause to fall or strike, at, against, into, or upon any engine, tender, carriage, or truck used upon any railway, any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person being in or upon such engine, tender, carriage, or truck, or in or upon any other engine, tender, carriage, or truck of any train of which such first-mentioned engine, tender, carriage, or truck shall form part, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years — or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (b)

Casting stone, &c. upon a railway carriage, with intent to endanger the safety of any person therein.

(a) This clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6, and the word 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'wilfully' throughout. As to principals in the second degree, and accessories, see sec.

67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to whipping, see ante, p. 900. As to sureties, see ante, p. 900. The Act extends to Ireland, but not to Scotland.

Doing or omitting anything to endanger passengers by railway.

Sec. 34. 'Whosoever, by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall endanger, or cause to be endangered, the safety of any person conveyed or being in or upon a railway, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (c)

Placing wood, &c. on railway with intent to obstruct or overthrow any engine, &c.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 35. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously put, place, cast, or throw upon or across any railway any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, or shall unlawfully and maliciously take up, remove, or displace any rail, sleeper, or other matter or thing belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously turn, move, or divert any points or other machinery belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously make or show, hide or remove, any signal or light upon or near to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any other matter or thing, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to obstruct, upset, overthrow, injure, or destroy any engine, tender, carriage, or truck using such railway, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years — or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and, if a male under the age of sixteen, with or without whipping.' (d)

Obstructing engines or carriages on railways.

Sec. 36. 'Whosoever, by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall obstruct or cause to be obstructed any engine or carriage using any railway, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (e)

(b) This clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 7. The word 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'wilfully.' The introduction of the word 'at' extends this clause to cases where the missile fails to strike any engine or carriage. The other words in italics were introduced to meet cases where a person throws into or upon one carriage of a train, when he intended to injure a person being in another carriage of the same train, and similar cases. In Reg. v. Court, 6 Cox C. C. 202, the prisoner was indicted for throwing a stone against a tender with intent to endanger the safety of persons on the tender, and it appeared that the stone fell on the tender, but there was no person on it at the time, and it was held that the section was limited to something thrown upon an engine or carriage having some person therein, and consequently that no offence within the statute was proved, but this case would clearly come within this clause. As to hard labour, &c., see the last note.

(c) This clause is taken from the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, the words of which were, any person who 'shall wilfully do, or cause to be done, anything in such a manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage using any railway, or to endanger the safety of persons conveyed in or upon the same.' The present clause extends to any unlawful act and any wilful omission or neglect. As to counsellors and abettors, see sec. 67, ante, p. 881. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 900. As to fine and sureties, see ante, p. 900.

(d) This clause is taken from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6, and 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'wilfully' throughout. As to principals in the second degree, and accessories, hard labour, whipping, and sureties, see ante, pp. 4, 5.

(e) This clause is taken from the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15. See note (c) supra. As to counsellors and abettors, hard labour, fine, and sureties, see ante, pp. 4, 5.

Sec. 37. * Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously cut, break, throw down, destroy, injure, or remove any battery, machinery, wire, cable, post, or other matter or thing whatsoever, being part of or being used or employed in or about any electric or magnetic telegraph, or in the working thereof, or shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or obstruct in any manner whatsoever the sending, conveyance, or delivery of any communication by any such telegraph, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour: Provided that if it shall appear to any justice, on the examination of any person charged with any offence against this section, that it is not expedient to the ends of justice that the same should be prosecuted by indictment, the justice may proceed summarily to hear and determine the same, and the offender shall, on conviction thereof, at the discretion of the justice, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months, or else shall forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding ten pounds as to the justice shall seem meet.' (f)

Injuries to electric or magnetic telegraphs.

Sec. 38. * Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously, by any overt act, attempt to commit any of the offences in the last preceding section mentioned, shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, at the discretion of the justice, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months, or else shall forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding ten pounds as to the justice shall seem meet.' (g)

Attempt to injure such telegraphs.

Upon an indictment on the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it appeared that the railway was constructed under an Act of Parliament, and was intended for the conveyance of passengers in carriages drawn by steam, but at the time of the offence the conveyance of passengers for hire had not commenced, and the traffic was confined to the carriage of materials and workmen. A railway truck was placed by the prisoners across the railway so as to obstruct the passage of any carriage and endanger the safety of persons conveyed therein, but its position was discovered, and it was removed before any collision occurred; it was objected that the case was not within the statute—1st, because the railway was not used for the conveyance of passengers for hire; 2ndly, because no actual obstruction took place; but, upon a case reserved, it was held that the Railway complete, but not opened for passengers.

(f) This clause is new. It consists of two branches. The first provides against injuries to any battery or other thing used in electric telegraphs. The second provides against the preventing or obstructing communications by such telegraphs: and these offences are made misdemeanors; but as it was foreseen that there may be malicious injuries, which would fall within the first part of this clause, of too trifling a character to deserve so severe a punishment, it was thought fit to empower any justice, who is of opinion that it is not expedient to the ends of justice that the offence should be prosecuted by indictment, summarily to convict the offender. As to counselors and abettors, hard labour, fine, and sureties, see ante, pp. 4, 5. The summary proceedings may be in England under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and in Ireland under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93.

(g) This clause is new, and provides against attempts to commit the offences created by the last section. As to the proceedings on this section see the last note.

case was within the statute. It must be assumed that the railway was completed, and that all that required to be done was to open it for the public traffic. The prisoners did put an obstruction on the line, and they put it in such a position as to endanger the safety of the persons conveyed. The case therefore came within both branches of the section; there was an obstruction put on the line, and it was put so as to endanger the safety of the persons conveyed. It was contended that there could be no obstruction until some train were absolutely obstructed; but such a construction could not be maintained. The object of the Legislature was obviously to prevent any disaster to those using the railway, and to punish those who put obstructions in such a manner as was likely to cause such disaster. The case was, therefore, within the intention of the statute; and though, in the ordinary course of things, it would generally be after the railway was fully opened that the public required to be protected, yet an obstruction before that time was within the mischief as well as the words of the statute. (h)

On an indictment under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96, s. 16, for throwing a stone on a railway, so as to endanger the safety of passengers, the question was, did the defendant wilfully throw the stone, and was the effect of its being so thrown to endanger their safety, and it was no defence that there was no intent to do any injury.

On an indictment on the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96, s. 15, for throwing a stone upon a railway in such manner as thereby to endanger the safety of one G. C. and of divers other persons being conveyed on the engines and carriages then using the railway, it appeared that the defendant was on a bridge over the railway, and let drop a stone on a train that was passing; the stone was a thin flat stone, about twice the thickness of a biscuit; and the train was travelling at the rate of about fifteen miles an hour. The railway was opened in January 1845, but no Act of Parliament was obtained until the July following. It was objected on the interpretation clause, sec. 21, (hh) that this railway was not constructed under an Act of Parliament; but Alderson, B., held that the effect of that clause was to extend and not to weaken the effect of section 15. (i) And his Lordship told the jury, 'there are two propositions for you to consider:—First, did the defendant wilfully cast or drop this stone on the railway? and secondly, did the casting that stone on the railway in the manner in which it was cast endanger the safety of any of the persons travelling on the railway at that time? If you are satisfied on both these points, he is guilty. If the defendant had this stone in his hand at the time when the train was passing, and it dropped accidentally from his hand on the railway, you should acquit him; for that which occurs by accident cannot be said to be wilful. Should you think that the defendant did cast the stone on the railway wilfully, the next question is, was it cast there by him under such circumstances as to endanger the safety of G. C., the guard, the engineer, or any of the passengers or persons in the carriages? Now that would depend very much on the rate at which the train was proceeding at the time, and the weight and the size of the stone dropped. The former is material, because it is the same thing whether I throw a stone at your head or you run your head against the stone. If, therefore, the train were coming along at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, it would strike with that velocity a stone that meets it. You might drop a stone on a broad-wheeled waggon without doing any harm; but it may be very different where you drop it on a machine going at an enormous rate. Suppose a passenger in this train, going at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, had put his head out of the window, or the guard were to do so, which his duty might render necessary, a blow from a stone of this size and weight certainly might endanger his safety.' The jury found that the defendant foolishly dropped the stone on the railway, but not with the intention of doing any injury; Alderson, B.: 'The intention of the prisoner in dropping the stone is not the question. It is, "did he purposely drop the stone on the railway, and would the effect of the stone's being so dropped be to endanger the safety of the persons on the railway."'^(k)

Where on an indictment under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it appeared that large quantities of earth and rubbish were found placed across the railway, and the prosecutor's case was that this had been done by the defendant wilfully and in order to obstruct the use of the railway; and the defendant's case was, that the earth and rubbish had been accidentally dropped on the railway; Maule, J., told the jury, that if the rubbish had been dropped on the rails by mere accident, the defendant was not guilty; but 'it was by no means necessary, in order to bring the case within this Act, that the defendant should have thrown the rubbish on the rails expressly with the view to upset the train of carriages. If the defendant designedly placed these substances, having a tendency to produce an obstruction, not caring whether they actually impeded the carriages or not, that was a case within the Act.' And on the jury asking 'what was the meaning of the term "wilfully" used in the statute?' the learned Judge added, 'he should consider the act to have been wilfully done, if the defendant intentionally placed the rubbish on the line, knowing that it was a substance likely to produce an obstruction; if, for instance, he had done so in order to throw upon the company's officers the necessary trouble of removing the rubbish.'^(l)

What is a wilful act.

On an information under a railway Act for throwing stones on the railway and wilfully obstructing the free passage of the railway, it appeared that the acts were done by persons employed by the defendant to repair a wall between the railway and his premises, and that on one occasion, the defendant, being present, told the men to go on, and this was held sufficient evidence to warrant the justices in convicting the defendant.^(m)

In a case upon the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it was strongly intimated that the neglect of a driver and stoker of an engine to keep a good look-out for signals, according to the rules of the railway company, whereby a collision occurred, and the safety of the passengers were endangered, was not an offence within the 15th section of that Act.⁽ⁿ⁾

maliciously placing a stone upon a railway with intent to obstruct the carriages travelling thereon, it appeared that the prisoners, two boys, were seen to go upon the railway, and whilst one held the lever by which the points were turned, so as to separate two portions of the rails, the other dropped a stone between them, so as to keep them separated; the result would have been, had the act not been detected, that the carriages would have been thrown off the rail. No motive was suggested except that of wanton mischief. The jury were told that it was not necessary that the prisoners should have entertained any feeling of malice against the railway company, or against any person travelling upon it; it was quite enough to support the charge if the act was done mischievously, and with a view to cause an obstruction of a train. (o)

The prisoner was indicted on the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, ss. 6, 7, for maliciously throwing a torch at a railway truck with intent in one count to injure it, in another to endanger the safety of persons travelling in the truck; there was, however, no one on the truck, upon which the prisoner let the torch fall; and Channel, B., held that there was no evidence to support the second count. (p)

On an indictment on the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 7, for maliciously throwing a stone into a railway carriage with intent to endanger the safety of any person in it, it appeared that there had been considerable popular excitement against a person who was about to travel by the train, and there was a crowd assembled at the time of its departure, and the prisoner had thrown a stone intending to hit him, but without any previous ill-will. It was urged that the statute did not apply; its object was to protect passengers by railways, and not to afford any additional protection against common assaults. Erle, J., after consulting Williams, J., said: 'Looking at the preamble of the sections relating to this class of offences, which recites that it is "expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults," and looking also to the provision of these clauses as indicated by the terms of section 6, immediately preceding the section upon which this indictment is framed, I consider that the "intent to endanger the safety of any person" travelling on the railway, spoken of in both sections, must appear to have been an intent to inflict some grievous bodily harm, and such as would sustain an indictment for assaulting or wounding a person with intent to do some grievous bodily harm; but as that is a question of degree, which it is impossible to define further than in those terms, it must be a question for the jury, upon the facts, whether there has been such an intent;' and his Lordship directed the jury, that 'in order to convict the prisoner they must be satisfied that he intended to

(p) Reg. v. Sanderson, 1 F. & F. 37. See Reg. v. Court, ante, p. 1056, note (b). It is reported to have been objected that the words 'matter or thing' were ejusdem generis with the other words employed, and did not include the case of a combustible, which could only injure a truck by means of fire; for otherwise the 8th section would be nugatory, and that section requires proof of an intent to destroy the carriage by fire. Now, this is an error, for sec. 8 has nothing to do with railway carriages, but only with railway buildings, and it is quite clear that ss. 6, 7 include everything whatsoever that is used with any of the intents therein mentioned.

What is an intent to endanger the safety of a person travelling on a railway.

inflict on the person at whom he aimed some grievous bodily harm.' (q)

Where on a trial for assault at the Central Criminal Court, it appeared that the prosecutrix and the defendant left Brighton together by a train which ran to the New Cross station, which is within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court; and the assault was committed between Brighton and the Three Bridges station, in the county of Sussex, and the prosecutrix there left the carriage in which she had been previously riding with the defendant, and travelled in another carriage to New Cross; it was held that by the combined operation of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 13, and the Central Criminal Court Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 2, the case might be tried at the Central Criminal Court. There was but one journey, and although the carriages were distinct, they all formed but one conveyance, and the fact that the prosecutrix and defendant rode in different carriages after the assault did not affect the question; it was the same as if they had occupied different parts of the same carriage. The words 'through which any carriage shall have passed,' in the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, refer to the time of the trial, and not to a time antecedent to the commitment of the offence, and therefore make the offence triable at any place within the limits of the beginning and end of the journey, and do not confine the trial to any county through which the train had passed up to the time of the offence. (r)

Venue of an assault committed in a journey by railway.

(q) Reg. v. Rooke, 1 F. & F. 107. This case does not appear to have been argued on the part of the Crown, and, with all deference to the very learned Judges, it clearly proceeded on a mistake. The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, contains a number of enactments which have no bearing whatever on each other; the Act was framed to provide for totally different matters, which at that time called for a remedy for each. Secs. 1 & 2 relate to persons found by night with intent to commit felonies. Sec. 3 relates to administering chloroform. Secs. 4 & 5 relate to aggravated assaults. Then secs. 6, 7, & 8 are railway clauses, and it is perfectly clear that, although a person who commits an offence within either sec. 6 or sec. 7, may commit an assault, it is not essential to prove an assault in any case under either sec. 6 or sec. 7; in other words, neither of these sections makes an assault an ingredient in any offence contained in them, and no indictment upon them ever does allege an assault. They were most carefully framed for the very purpose of including every case where there was an 'intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person;' and those words were selected as much more general than with intent to do grievous bodily harm. It is also a fallacy to suppose that, even if the sections were to be construed together, sec. 4 warrants this decision; for though one branch of it is 'inflict any grievous bodily harm,' the other is 'cut, stab, or wound' without any aggravation; so that a wound, however slight, and given without any intention to inflict grievous bodily harm, is within the section. Every indictment must allege the intent to be to injure or endanger the safety of some person, and it is very confidently submitted that the only proper question to be left to the jury in every such case is, did the defendant do the act with intent to injure or endanger the safety of that person?

(r) Reg. v. French, 8 Cox C. C. 252. The Recorder. Sussex was assumed to be out of the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court. It was also objected that the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, did not apply to railway trains, because they were not contemplated when that Act passed, and they did not come within the terms of the Act; this objection seems to have been tacitly overruled.
